"SEC. 28. That it shall be the duty of the Forester of the Department of Agriculture to present to the board all essential facts bearing upon the relation of forests to the various problems under consideration and the value and importance of forests and woodland and other growth and their proper control and extension and protection from fire; also such facts as may be essential to the proper enlargement of forested areas for the protection of watersheds and the maintenance of the flow of rivers during the low-water season and the prevention of denudation and erosion, with consequent silting up of waterways and harbors, and to prepare and present to the board comprehensive plans for the protection of the forests from fire and other destructive agencies.

"GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

"SEC. 29. That it shall be the duty of the Director of the Geological Survey to recommend to the board appropriate surveys and examinations, and upon proper approval cause to be executed topographic surveys of each drainage basin, these being planned with reference to the work contemplated by the board and the immediate demands and needs of the board. Such surveys shall include and show, in addition to the topography, the character of all lands embraced therein, and it shall be his duty to classify the same and designate the best use to which said lands may be devoted in carrying out the provisions of this act. The topographic maps shall be of such scale as will bring out the existence of feasible storage or reservoir sites. He shall make such additional surveys of specific localities as may be required by the constructing engineers, and in such surveys he shall establish monuments based on geodetic horizontal and vertical control. The surveys shall be of such nature as to provide adequate bases for geologic investigation and engineering works. He shall also cause measurements to be made of the flow of streams at such places as may be designated by the board as yielding results of largest importance in the discussion of the problems in hand and the execution of proposed engineering works, and shall carry on such studies in river pollution and purification, in water-power possibilities, and other stream investigations as the board may designate. It shall be his further duty to examine all forested lands or lands intended to be afforested or reforested which it is proposed to purchase under this act, and to report whether the control and use of such lands will influence the preservation of water supplies or stream flow or tend to regulate the flow of navigable rivers on whose watersheds they are located.

"RECLAMATION SERVICE.

"SEC. 30. That it shall be the duty of the Director of the Reclamation Service to bring before the board the results attained in the construction of works of irrigation and reclamation throughout the arid and semiarid regions of the United States and the application of the experience thus obtained to the conditions existing in the more humid sections of the United States. He shall extend the surveys and investigations and construction of irrigation works such as are authorized in the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, throughout the United States and including reclamation of land by drainage as well as by irrigation: Provided, however, That no part of the fund created by the act of June 17, 1902, shall be expended for this purpose. Such further investigations and construction and operations in States and Territories other than those covered by the original act above referred to and amendments thereto shall be made in accordance with such rules and regulations as shall be established by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be subject to such of the terms, provisions, and requirements of said reclamation act as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine are to be made applicable thereto, but shall be at the expense of the river-regulation fund created by this act, and expenditures from said last-mentioned fund may be similarly made in any State or Territory. He shall construct, operate, and maintain, until otherwise provided by law, such irrigation and drainage works and systems as the board may determine are needed for the regulation of the streams and rivers and the improvement of agricultural conditions, or for the proper control, disposition, and utilization of sewage or other waste waters which, without such regulation, would pollute the streams or injuriously affect the health or prosperity of the community. He shall also present to the board proposed plans for cooperation with irrigation or drainage projects or enterprises constructed, initiated, or contemplated by States, districts, municipalities, corporations, associations, or individuals, and shall negotiate agreements for coordinating and making more useful works already in existence or proposed through their incorporation into more effective systems.

"CORPS OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

"SEC. 31. That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall present to the board all proposed plans for works proposed to be built under this act which the Waterways Commission shall determine are to be built under his supervision, including plans for levees, dikes, revetments, dams, canals, cut-offs, spillways, controlled outlets, floodwater channels, and wasteways, bank-protective and channel-fixation works, reservoirs or basins for the storage of flood waters for flood prevention and river control, or works for which examinations and surveys have been made by or with the cooperation of States, municipalities, or districts, and which it is sought to have constructed under this act, together with such facts and data as may be required for the construction of such works, or any of them, for the regulation of the flow of rivers. He shall also construct, operate, and maintain such levees, flood-protection, channel-fixation, and bank-protective works as are built in accordance with this act and also such reservoirs as are so built for the storage of water to control and regulate the flow of rivers, and to reenforce such flow in seasons of low water and to prevent floods and protect lands and communities from overflow as may be determined by the Waterways Commission: Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall be so administered as in no way to supersede or conflict with any specific provisions which Congress shall from time to time make by way of appropriations other than such as are made by this act for work and improvements to be performed or maintained by the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, but that all work prescribed under this section shall be supplemental to and coordinated with the work as specifically prescribed by Congress in other acts.

"DUTIES OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY THE PRESIDENT.

"SEC. 32. That it shall be the duty of the members of the board of river regulation appointed by the President and constituting the executive committee of the board of river regulation, as hereinbefore provided, under the direction of the chairman of the board, to consider, prepare, and present to the board comprehensive plans providing for the best utilization of the water resources of the United States in connection with river regulation, flood prevention and protection, and the increase of the flow of rivers in low-water seasons and the maintenance at all times of a navigable stage of water in the waterways of the United States, and providing also for the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes and transportation, and the establishment, maintenance, and protection of terminals and transfer sites and facilities for transshipment between rail and water routes, and to adjust all the plans contemplated for the projects constructed under this act to the ultimate purpose of regulating and standardizing the flow of the rivers and inland waterways of the United States, in aid of interstate commerce as aforesaid; and, further, to give expert advice to the board in its consideration of details, problems, and projects; and it shall be their special duty to constantly promote and stimulate harmonious and effective cooperation between the different bureaus and services of the National Government and between the Nation and States, municipalities, and other local agencies in working out constructive plans under this act; and it shall further be their duty to examine and study plans presented to the board for consideration, with the view of promoting the fullest possible measure of efficiency and economy in administration and construction, and avoiding all duplication in the work of the respective bureaus.

"EQUITABLE APPORTIONMENT AMONG WATERWAY SYSTEMS.

"SEC. 33. That in carrying out the provisions of this act regard must be had, as far as practicable, to the equitable apportionment and contemporaneous execution of the works and projects contemplated under this act among the several waterway systems of the United States.

"Not less than $10,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the Appalachian and Atlantic region, including the territory within the drainage basins of all rivers flowing into the Mississippi River below the Ohio River or into the Gulf of Mexico east of the Mississippi River, or into the Atlantic Ocean.

"Not less than $10,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the drainage basin of the Ohio River.

"Not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the drainage basin of the Mississippi River above St. Louis and the territory included in the drainage basins of the rivers draining into Canada, or into the Great Lakes, or into the Mississippi River from the east between East St. Louis and Cairo, Ill.

"Not less than $10,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf of Mexico, and the territory lying between the Atchafalaya River, the Mississippi River, and the Gulf of Mexico, and including the Atchafalaya River as a flood-water outlet for the Mississippi River, and including the controlling works necessary for such use of said Atchafalaya River, and all levees and bank-protective works, cut-offs, and auxiliary floodwater channels necessary to control and prevent all overflows from said Atchafalaya River, which shall in this respect be regarded as in the same class with the Mississippi River and entitled to the same recognition in the matter of levee construction and flood protection for adjacent territory as the main Mississippi River.

"Not less than $10,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the territory included in the drainage basins of the Missouri river and of other rivers, bayous, and waterways flowing into the Mississippi River from the west below St. Louis or flowing or debouching directly or through connecting waterways into the Gulf of Mexico west of the Atchafalaya River.

"Not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years shall be apportioned to the territory including the drainage basin of the Colorado River, and extending on the west to the crest of the watersheds draining into the Pacific Ocean and on the north to the drainage basin of the Columbia and Snake Rivers; not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years to the drainage basins of the rivers flowing through or into the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys or into the Pacific Ocean in California; and not less than $5,000,000 annually for 10 years to the drainage basins of the Columbia and Snake Rivers and other rivers flowing into the Pacific Ocean in Oregon and Washington.

"The drainage basin of every river above mentioned shall be understood to include all the tributaries and source streams of such rivers.

"REPLENISHMENT OF RIVER REGULATION FUND BY BOND ISSUE.

"SEC. 34. That the President is authorized, whenever the current revenues are insufficient to provide the $60,000,000 annually appropriated for the river regulation fund, to make up the deficiency in such fund by the issue and sale of United States bonds, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and running for a period not exceeding 30 years.

"APPROPRIATIONS AND APPORTIONMENT.

"SEC. 35. That the moneys hereby annually appropriated in section 1 of this act, unless otherwise apportioned by the Waterways Commission, shall, subject to all the provisions of this act, be apportioned and expended by the services and bureaus herein named in carrying out the purposes and provisions of this act and under the direction of the heads of the respective departments and in accordance with existing laws and regulations or such modifications thereof as may be made from time to time in accordance with the general system or systems proposed by the board and approved by the Waterways Commission in the following sums annually, which shall be available until expended for the following purposes:

"For the Smithsonian Institution, for obtaining information and material relating to the subjects covered by this act in the United States and foreign countries, and publishing and distributing the same to the people of the United States, and for the establishment and maintenance of a Museum of Water and Forest Resources, and for any other purposes mentioned or referred to in section 11 of this act, $1,000,000.

"For the Department of Agriculture, for the increase and development of the porosity and absorbent qualities and storage capacity of the soil upon which rain or snow may fall in order that its run-off may be in that way checked and the water absorbed into the earth, and to that end for the establishment and maintenance of garden schools and demonstration garden farms, and instruction in intensive cultivation and the use of water for irrigation therein and in rural industrial communities, and for investigations and instruction with reference to terracing and methods of cultivation adapted to preventing erosion on hillside slopes, and with reference to the use of water as a fertilizer and stimulant to plant growth in all ways, and the adoption of all methods of agriculture that will increase the porosity and absorbent qualities of the soil and check surface wash or erosion or sudden run-off and thereby tend to prevent the formation of floods, and for the acquisition of lands that may be required for such purposes, and for any other purposes mentioned or referred to in section 12 of this act, $5,000,000.

"For the Department of Commerce, for the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, in cooperation with other departments, to promote the objects of this act in such manner as may be directed by the Waterways Commission, $2,000,000.

"For the Geological Survey, for topographic surveys and the measurement of streams and other hydrographic and hydrologic works, and for the examination of lands intended to be purchased under this act, and for any other things required by the board to be done in connection with any investigation or construction done under this act, $3,000,000.

"For the Reclamation Service, for the reclamation of lands by either irrigation or drainage, or both, and for the building of irrigation and drainage systems to aid in the regulation or equalization of the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams through the conservation, utilization, and ground storage of waters in irrigated or drained lands, and for the acquisition and improvement by irrigation or drainage of specific tracts of land for intensive cultivation and settlement, and for the building of canals and ditches, and carrying to completion any and all methods of utilizing water for irrigation as a means for water conservation or river regulation, and for any other purpose mentioned or referred to in section 15 of this act, $20,000,000.

"For the Forest Service, (a) for the protection from fire and insect infestation of national forests, where such protection is essential to the preservation and maintenance of water supplies, and for the acquisition of lands within or near existing national forests or other lands which are necessary to the adequate protection of water supplies, and for building the necessary roads, trails, fire lines, fire-protection stations, telephone lines, and for any and all other things required for such fire protection, including the fighting of fires and the employment of forest guards and rangers, $2,000,000.

"(b) For the protection from fire of the forested watersheds of all rivers and streams, and for the organization and maintenance of a system of fire protection on any private or State forest lands situated upon the watersheds of such rivers or streams, in cooperation with any State or group of States, in the manner provided for in an act entitled 'An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of rivers,' known as the Appalachian National Forest act, and also in direct cooperation with cities, counties, towns, villages, and other owners of woodlands and forested areas on watersheds, and wherever essential to the preservation of water supplies and for the protection of such forested watersheds and areas from insect infestation, $1,000,000.

"(c) For the protection, perpetuation, enlargement, maintenance, regulation, and control of water supplies by the establishment and maintenance of forest nurseries, the planting or replanting of forests, the reforestation of denuded areas, the carrying out of silvicultural improvements in the national forests, and the establishment and maintenance of forest plantation and parks and the acquisition of lands therefor to provide instruction in the planting and care of trees and forests for the purpose of awakening and maintaining a local interest in and knowledge of the relation of forests to the preservation of water supplies and stream flow, $1,000,000.

"(d) For the acquisition of forest lands by and through the National Forest Reservation Commission as and in the manner provided for in the Appalachian National Forest act above referred to, subject to all the conditions and requirements contained in said act, including lands along the Mississippi River which may have been thrown outside the levees or left without levee protection in designing the levee systems, $5,000,000.

"Provided, That the provisions of the said Appalachian National Forest act shall, after the expiration thereof by limitation, still continue and be in force with reference to all moneys made available for expenditure thereunder by this act, either for fire protection or for the acquisition of forest lands.

"For the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for building bank protective works to prevent erosion and cutting of the banks and consequent caving, and to control the river and hold it in a permanently fixed and established channel, and for building and maintaining levees, revetments, dikes, walls, embankments, gates, wasteways, by-passes, cutoffs, spillways, controlled outlets, drainage canals, flood-water canals and channels, weir dams, sill dams, restraining dams, impounding basins, and bank protective works for river regulation, and, as a means to that end, the building of works for reclamation, drainage, and flood protection, and for building reservoirs and artificial lakes and basins for the storage of flood waters to prevent and protect against floods and overflows, erosion of river banks, and breaks in levees, and to regulate the flow of source streams, rivers, and waterways, and reenforce such flow during the drought and low-water periods, and for the operation and maintenance of the same, $20,000,000.

"SEC. 36. That out of funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated there is hereby appropriated and made immediately available the sum of $2,000,000 for the organization and operation of the Waterways Commission and the Board of River Regulation provided for by this act, and the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the lower Mississippi River below Cairo, to meet the conditions growing out of the existing floods and to meet similar conditions in the immediate future, the latter sum to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not want to be placed in the situation of the newly arrived immigrant who came to this land. When he was asked whether he was a Republican or a Democrat he said that he did not know but that he was "agin the Government." I do not want to be "agin the Government," nor am I, but I am unalterably against the bill. Whether it may be termed a Government bill or not, it is a committee bill.

I have stated many times before in this Chamber that I believe the wise system to prevail in this country is Government ownership in this great utility construction and in running great utilities, and I particularly believe that with reference to this great water-power problem. It is a mighty problem and affects every man, woman, and child in the land.

The statement read by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] the other day and the little statement I added that I had copied from Harper's Weekly show how rapidly the great water-power resource of our land is being taken up by avaricious and greedy cormorants for their own purposes and their own end. Hence I say if there ever was a time when we should check this step we ought to begin now. To delay it longer will be too late.

I think I can say without question, from that which has been evidenced here in this Chamber, that this bill will pass. I feel that it will be a public disaster, a wrong, almost a crime. It leaves too loose and too free the taking of these privileges by private corporations. Hence I have found myself arrayed against the measure not because of a desire to oppose the Senators who are pressing the bill, the majority of the committee, but, on the contrary, my feelings are so kindly and friendly to them that it would rather lead me the other way. But I have opposed the measure and I have voted for every amendment that has been offered in the Senate in regard to this bill, because every one of them safeguarded the public interest more than did the bill itself and made it more difficult for these great privileges to be frittered away, not for 50 years, but for all time.

Public sentiment is very much aroused, I say, with reference to this matter. I have received many letters from men of prominence in our country, from one end of it to be other, urging that the bill be defeated. I feel personally that it is an unfortunate bill.

Yesterday the proposition to harness the Great Falls on the upper Potomac River came up. Whether or not it was just the fit time or place to put that measure onto the pending bill I am not willing to discuss. I do know the fact, however, that efforts have heretofore been made to get such legislation, and in every instance in which they have been made they have been shunted off. I am much interested in the project. When I first came to this city five years ago, because of curiosity I visited those falls, as I have frequently since done. I have been wonderfully impressed with the stupendous power that is there running to waste at our very door, while we are paying an extravagant sum for lighting and heating in the District, and when this power might be utilized for the City of Washington.

I came in contact with a very prominent engineer within the past month, a man largely interested in affairs, a man whose ability and scientific knowledge are unquestioned in New York and in the country generally. When I brought this project to his attention he said, "Yes; it is wrong to let that power go to waste." I said, "Why is it that it can not be harnessed?" He said, "It can be with the greatest readiness in the world." Then I asked as to the cost. He said he had made a very considerable study of this subject, and his statement was to me: "Why, MARTINE, you do not know at what a low cost electricity could be generated at a falls like this and so close for transmission to the city." I said then, "At how low a cost can that be done?" "Well," said he, "from 3 to 6½ mills per kilowatt hour." Yet here we pay, I think, 10 cents per kilowatt hour. I feel that we are very derelict in our duty if we fail to take this step, and to take some position in this matter. I regretted very much to see the amendment for that purpose rejected on yesterday, and I hope that in some way it may be resuscitated. It would be for the advantage and the welfare of the people of our city, and it would be a step in advance to the people of the country to utilize these great facilities in the public interest.

Opposition has been made when I have favored the proposition of Government ownership. It has been stated that the Government could not enter into such a work—that it would be too stupendous and too great—and yet I have seen some of the same gentlemen whom I have heard advance that argument stand here on this floor and refer to the levees on the banks of the Mississippi River, stating that their construction and maintenance could not be a State operation, that it must be a great Government operation. I appreciate their good sense in taking that position; I appreciate their wisdom; but I say that if their position is good with reference to the levees on the Mississippi River it is quite as good a proposition with reference to these great waterways of our land.

I shall find myself—not from a desire but from a sense of duty to myself and to my country—compelled to vote "no" on the passage of this bill unless it be most signally corrected by other amendments, of which, however, I have no hope, as every amendment, unless it has been one of but minor importance, has been studiously and, I feel, ruthlessly rejected, which I sincerely regret.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that something ought to be said here in regard to the subject that was touched on briefly by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. As he said in his remarks, complaint had been made that he had talked too long and too often on this question; and he very well illustrated that, in order to get the Senate to hear what he had to say, it was necessary for him to repeat several times, because it was very seldom that he could get a very large audience at one time. He explained his training in the House of Representatives, and told us that when he was a Member of that House he could say all he cared to say on any subject in an hour, but that when he came to the Senate he found a different rule prevailing, and that the tendency here was to spread words out, to consume time, instead of, as in the House, to concentrate and to say as much as possible in a short time. Here the rule is, as the Senator has said, to say as much as possible in as long a time as possible.

The Senator has told us what we all know, if we think about it; and I think if he would continue the tactics that he has begun, which has been objected to, he would do his country a world of good, because it will only be by such means that the Senate will be brought occasionally face to face with the fact that interminable and endless debate does not lead to good legislation, but that it leads to empty seats. As the Senator says, Senators come in and often vote on propositions which they do not understand.

I believe this is a good time to call attention to the fact that we ought to have some form of rule in the Senate that would have a tendency not to go, of course, to the other extreme, like the rule of the House of Representatives goes, and as it must necessarily go, because it is a larger body than is this; but in some way to modify the extremes to which the Senate goes.

I want to call the attention of the Senate now to Senate resolution No. 17, in which it is provided that the time that any Senator can use on any bill shall be limited to three hours; and, in addition to that time, he shall have 15 minutes on every amendment that is offered, and that by unanimous consent he may, of course, speak longer on any amendment. If we had a system here of debating amendments as they come up, and when Senators knew they would be called upon to vote several times, perhaps, in one afternoon on various amendments, we would have more Senators present to hear what was being said, with the result, as the Senator from Nevada has so well said, that we would take up less time and legislate much better.

I have taken a good deal of the time of the Senate on amendments to this bill which I favor, and, as I think, others have taken time on amendments in which they believed, acting in good faith, trying, as they conscientiously believed, to improve the bill, but in no sense has there been on any occasion any attempt on any Senator's part to simply kill time. Senators in speaking have been conscientiously advocating something in which they believe, but they must necessarily repeat often; and as to an amendment once voted on, a Senator, perhaps, may feel it his duty to offer it again in a different form, and to again debate it, in order to reach as many Senators as possible, because under the system of interminable and endless debate Senators can not be expected to stay here. As the Senator from Nevada has said, the tendency is just the reverse of what his training had previously been, and he naturally fell into that tendency, as all of us do, and as all of us must when the time is unlimited; and, so far as talking is concerned, talk itself being almost unlimited, the tendency is to spread the talk out over as much ground as possible.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] has called attention to an amendment on which we voted last night in which I have taken a deep interest. I believe that the amendment would have prevailed in the Senate if Senators had all understood what they were voting on. A Senator told me last night, within 15 minutes after the vote had been taken, that he did not understand what the proposition was on which he was voting, and that he naturally felt inclined to go with the committee. This practice results in bad legislation, in my humble judgment. It must necessarily do so. It seems to me that the Senator from New Jersey has well pointed out a failure on the part of the Senate to do something that many Senators believe in, but who were opposed to doing it in the way in which it was offered, when we know that this interminable debate, lasting for weeks and weeks upon one measure, means that such propositions as that involved in the Great Falls amendment can never for practical purposes be reached for consideration in the regular order of business of the Senate. There is not a chance in a thousand, where the Senate is unlimited in its debate and devotes so much time to various bills that are perhaps part of an administration program, to get such a measure considered separately, and the only way is to tack an amendment onto a bill like this. Personally, I think that this bill was a very appropriate place on which to put the amendment; that it was, in fact, the most appropriate bill on which to place it, although everyone must concede in theory that the proper way would have been to have taken the matter up in a separate bill; but in practice there is not one chance in a thousand to get that kind of a proposition up, because there are those who strenuously object to it. It is regrettable to see that such a proposition——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Before what committee is the bill to which the Senator from Nebraska refers pending?

Mr. NORRIS. It is pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator know whether that committee has given the bill any special consideration?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it has given the bill no special consideration, although it has been before that committee about three years altogether.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator know whether the bill has been referred to a subcommittee?

Mr. NORRIS. In the last Congress it was referred to a subcommittee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has it been referred to a subcommittee in this Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. No, sir.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska is mistaken. I think all the bills that have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia have been referred to subcommittees.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to have the Senator from California correct me, if I am wrong.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Senator from Nebraska requested a hearing before the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not in this Congress. I requested a hearing at least a dozen times in the last Congress, but was unable to get it. As I said yesterday, I do not mean any disrespect to the members of the committee. Everybody was extremely busy and measures that were considered of greater importance were pending before our committees. I understand that in the last Congress the District Committee only had one or two meetings. If I am wrong about that, I should like to have the Senator from California, who is a member of that committee, correct me now.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress the District Committee did practically no business at all except to pass upon appointments to office, and some members of the committee complained of that. There was also complaint made on the floor of the Senate that the committee was not doing its work. At this session of Congress, however, the committee has been doing better. It is holding regular meetings of the committee now, and I hope the bill in which the Senator is interested may be reached very soon. I myself certainly shall be anxious to see that it has a hearing.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why could not the Senator introduce that proposal as an amendment to the District bill? I think it ought to pass.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean the District of Columbia appropriation bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. It would be; that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. That means that one man could kill it, so the Senator can imagine how far I would get with it in that way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it ever been reported on unfavorably?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the vote yesterday showed that the sentiment of the Senate is in favor of the proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator; and I think the vote of yesterday is going to have a very excellent effect in connection with the project. I do not want the Senator from North Carolina or the Senate to get the idea that the agitation in favor of the Great Falls improvement is going to cease. I feel very much encouraged by the vote which was taken yesterday.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senator will press the matter. I am in favor of it, and I have never been able to see why the District Committee did not report such a measure. I think the Senate is in favor of utilizing that great water power, which is now going to waste. I have felt there was perhaps some opposition to it on the outside which may have had something to do with the delay in carrying out the improvement.

Mr. NORRIS. Without criticizing anybody, I do not think that the particular reason which I am going to give has been used by any Senator, at least not to my knowledge. I have no intimation of that kind to make. I do not think that those who have not taken the matter up have been animated by ulterior motives. As I said a while ago, the last Congress was a very busy one. The Committee on the District of Columbia is one which does not appeal to Senators who are vitally interested in a great deal of legislation more important to their localities and States.

There are only three reasons, Mr. President, why the power possibilities of Great Falls should not be developed. The first one of these reasons is the Potomac Electric Power Co., the second reason is the Potomac Electric Power Co., and the third reason is the Potomac Electric Power Co. The Senate, in my judgment, whenever it takes the matter up, is going to pass favorably on it. It is only a question of getting the Senate to take it up; that is all. I do not believe there is any Member of the Senate or any Member of the House against it; in fact, I do not know that anybody is against it, except perhaps for the reason that they do not want the Government to go into a development of that kind. A great many people are conscientiously opposed to that; but it seems to me that the objections against the Government making this particular improvement are probably less than can be mentioned in connection with such a development anywhere in the United States, because the Government of the United States will be the greatest one patron and user of electricity to be developed, and the Capital City of Washington, which is under the direct control of the United States, will be the other great patron. We are bound to legislate for the District, so that there is a particular reason why this improvement should be made contiguous to this city, which does not apply to any other project in the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when we are appropriating $1,500,000——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will admonish the Senator from Nebraska that the rule is being enforced today which has been established here during the past two years, that when a Senator yields the second time he forfeits the floor for that day on the question under consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I can not yield to the Senator from North Carolina. The Chair will recognize, however, that that rule has not been enforced at any time lately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true, but after four weeks of debate the Chair thinks it is time that the rule should be enforced.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator on the floor will have to take notice of the occupant of the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would not enforce the rule against the Senator without calling his attention to it.

Mr. NORRIS. It has always been my idea, Mr. President, that no Senator ought to be allowed to yield time to another Senator to make a speech. It does not seem to me, however, that the rule ought to operate to take the Senator having the floor off the floor, but that when a Senator interrupts another and occupies the time for the purpose of making a speech himself it ought to be the right of any Member of the Senate or of the Chair to call such Senator to order and to stop him. I recognize that interruptions in the course of discussions on questions under consideration often lead to valuable information being disclosed. It is only by that kind of debate and the asking of questions which are pertinent and proper that we can get all the information that it is possible to secure in the discussion or consideration of any question.

Mr. President, I believe that the Great Falls of the Potomac will be developed. Agitation on the question will be kept up, and I am satisfied that what has happened in the Senate here will be taken notice of by the committee which has under consideration a bill providing for that project, and that action will come out of it. In my judgment, all the Senate has to do is to take it up for consideration, for it seems to me that when that is done it must result in practically a unanimous vote in its favor. I regret that it could not be put onto this bill. I know that, even if the committee reports out a separate measure and it goes to the calendar, it will be very difficult to take up the calendar. With the calendar already clogged, the morning hour has been eliminated temporarily, either because we want to devote more time to the pending bill, which has already taken several weeks, or because of some unpleasant matter which it is feared might arise. At any rate, it occurs that of late we have had no morning hour and no opportunity to get to the calendar. Even if consent were given to consider bills on the calendar, the probabilities are that it would only apply to unobjected bills, which means that, for one reason or another, having a bearing on a bill or otherwise, any Senator could prevent taking up a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Oliver	Smoot
Brandegee	Hughes	Overman	Sterling
Broussard	Husting	Page	Stone
Catron	James	Poindexter	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene	Thompson
Chilton	Jones	Ransdell	Tillman
Clapp	Kern	Reed	Wadsworth
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Robinson	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Warren
du Pont	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Fall	McLean	Shields	Works
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. These announcements may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. STONE. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word; I will not detain the Senate long. I trust there will be no confusion between the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and the amendment offered by myself to the pending bill. Both of these amendments provide for a national waterways commission, but the amendment of the Senator from Nevada provides for a commission under which will be expended the enormous sum of $60,000,000 a year each year for 10 years. The amendment I propose provides for a commission which will investigate the subject of flood prevention and the related subjects of the storage of waters and the use of those waters for irrigation and power purposes. The amendment carries an appropriation of $200,000 to pay the expenses of that commission.

I want to say, Mr. President, that there is something very attractive about the plan proposed by the Senator from Nevada; it appeals to the imagination; it is a grand scheme, and I think sooner or later we will adopt some such plan; but, as a prerequisite to the adoption of any such plan as that or the appropriation of any such amount of money, there must be the preliminary work of surveys and estimates, and that is just what my amendment provides for.

One word further, Mr. President, in reference to the need for legislation of this kind, as it has been emphasized over and over again by the Waterways Commission which made its report in 1912 and is now emphasized by a report of the Secretary of War dated April 15, 1914. I find in this report of the Secretary of War good ground for the pending amendment. The Secretary goes on to speak of the board especially appointed for these investigations, and says, with reference to that:

> The board has collected a large amount of data, some of which was already available in the various district offices of the Engineer Department, but finds that additional data in the way of rainfall statistics, gauging of streams, and special maps of drainage areas must be obtained before specific plans can be prepared. The board finds that some of these data can be obtained through the regular operations of the United States Weather Bureau, the United States Geological Survey, and of the States, counties, cities, etc., in the areas involved, under the system which has existed in the past, but that a large part of it can best be obtained by field parties organized in each of the engineer districts of the area under consideration—Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cleveland, first Cincinnati, second Cincinnati, and Louisville. The cost involved in collecting these data and preparing plans will be relatively small in comparison with the benefit to be derived, and this same method can readily be extended as necessary to the drainage areas of all rivers throughout the country which are subject to disastrous floods.
> The subject of flood protection and flood prevention is one of great national import, and it is imperative that steps be taken to ameliorate conditions in the most afflicted districts in the various parts of the United States without unnecessary delay.

If this measure does not prevail now as an amendment to the pending bill, when will Congress meet the imperative need of providing against river overflow and destruction?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator whether this amendment has been offered as a separate measure and referred to any committee?

Mr. STERLING. It has not been. I will say to the Senator that if he heard my remarks this morning upon presenting the amendment——

Mr. JONES. I heard part of them, but I was called out of the Chamber.

Mr. STERLING. I stated then that it was introduced substantially as it is now, in the form of this amendment, as a Senate joint resolution in 1913.

Mr. JONES. I simply wish to say to the Senator that this is a proposition that is very properly applicable to the river and harbor bill. I think we are very likely to have a bill of that kind considered; and I want to say to the Senator that I feel very friendly disposed to the idea involved in his amendment. I think it ought to be the first step taken in carrying out the grand scheme of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must admonish the Senator from South Dakota that he is occupying the floor for the second time on this amendment to-day. It is not proposed to cut him off now, because the inquiry of the Senator from Washington was directed to the parliamentary status of the bill; but if he enters upon any discussion as to his policy, that will constitute a sufficient interruption to deprive the Senator from South Dakota of the right to proceed.

Mr. JONES. Of course, I do not want to take away any of the rights of the Senator from South Dakota. This is the first time this rule has been suggested in connection with the four or five weeks of debate upon this bill.

Mr. STERLING. I had intended yielding the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have not taken any time at all on this bill during the 21 days that the debate has been going on. I did ask a question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], however, and the rule was invoked against me for the first time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair simply admonished the Senator as to the character of his inquiry—that it should be confined to a question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not take much time now; but I am going to say what I had intended to say then, so it will not do any good to invoke the rule against me.

I want to say that we have appropriated this year $1,500,000 for a new power plant. If we had conserved these waters and erected this plant as proposed, we would not have had to appropriate that $1,500,000. Unless we do something of that kind we will have to appropriate more money. We could issue bonds and erect the proposed plant at 4 per cent, and save money on the power plant we are erecting to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator must not understand that the Chair has any desire to deprive him of an opportunity to take the floor. The Chair's only criticism is that he does not take the floor often enough.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to say just a word that I started to say a moment ago.

I feel very friendly toward this proposition, but I think it ought to come up in connection with the river and harbor bill. I think it ought to be considered by a committee. Personally I do not believe the amount provided in the amendment of the Senate from South Dakota is anything like ample to do what ought to be done. Furthermore, I think that whatever report is submitted ought to be required within a definite time. If you provide a commission like this, it will be a perpetual body, and we will have no reports from it that will be of any special benefit or influence with the public.

At any rate, I think the amendment ought to be given consideration by a committee. It has not been reported upon by any committee or by any officials of the Government; and I think the amount ought to be very largely increased, so that ample force can be provided to make whatever survey is necessary, and submit a report to us at least within a year or two.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a reply——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to extend any courtesy he can to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say, Mr. President, partly in answer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], that I fear the fate of a measure like this attached to the river and harbor bill. We know something of what has befallen river and harbor bills in the past, and I very much doubt whether such a measure would succeed as part of the river and harbor bill.

Further, I want to say to the Senator that I can see no need of referring this measure to a committee. As I stated in my remarks this morning, every great flood is in itself an object lesson; and the bill simply provides for a commission that will make surveys and estimates in regard to the prevention of floods.

As to the amount of $200,000 carried by the amendment, if that is not ample, a succeeding Congress can add to it. I believe myself that it is hardly sufficient to carry out the full work of this commission; but before the $200,000 is exhausted, or as soon as it is exhausted, Congress can make another appropriation for the work of the commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. As I have been out of the Senate Chamber on official business and have not heard the discussion, I am very glad that I do not have to vote.

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As that Senator is not in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HUSTING (when the name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota was called). I have been requested to announce a pair between the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Were he present, I should vote "yea"; but as he is absent from the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CATRON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. As he is not present and has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. As he is not present, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. JAMES. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE. I have been requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of sickness, and to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. HARDING. I understand that the pair of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, has been transferred, so I will exercise the right to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BECKHAM. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Borah	Husting	Myers	Sterling
Brandegee	James	Norris	Sutherland
Clapp	Kenyon	Oliver	Thompson
Cummins	La Follette	Page	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lane	Poindexter	Walsh
Harding	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Works.

NAYS—34.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hollis	Pomerene	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson, Me.	Ransdell	Stone
Chamberlain	Jones	Reed	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Robinson	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	McLean	Shafroth	Vardaman
Gore	Martin, Va.	Shields
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Simmons

NOT VOTING—38.

Brady	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Bryan	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	Goff	Owen	Thomas
Catron	Hughes	Penrose	Townsend
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Underwood
Colt	Kern	Pittman	Warren
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Weeks
Dillingham	Lippitt	Sherman	Williams
du Pont	Lodge	Shively
Fall	McCumber	Smith, Md.

So Mr. STERLING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask the courtesy of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Missouri.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have a notice standing on the Calendar to the effect that I would on to-morrow address the Senate on the subject of armed merchant ships and on other related subjects. With much care I have prepared a speech which I purposed to deliver, and in which I joined issue with some Senators who have spoken on these questions, particularly as to the law, if indeed there be a law established and recognized, touching the subject of armed merchantmen. There are potent reasons why I would be glad to lay these matured views on this and correlated subjects before the Senate; but some of my colleagues, in whose judgment I have great confidence, a number of them being substantially in accord with my views, have expressed to me their belief that it would be wiser and better in every way if I should defer the delivery of this address for the time being. I recognize the force of what they have said to me, and in fact sympathize with their suggestions.

Last night I had another very frank talk with the President—I say frank talk, for that is the way we talk with each other, when we talk, as we should. I am sure I will not offend if I say that so far from the President desiring to involve this country in this disastrous European war, his supreme wish is to avoid that calamity. I may not be in accord with some of his views; I have already stated on the Senate floor that I am not; but it should be impossible for any Senator to believe that the President has so changed the attitude he has so long maintained as an advocate of peace as to wish now to make this country a party to this conflict.

As Senators well know, I have from the first been earnestly opposed to having any of these questions presented in any formal way to the Senate, and I have been equally opposed to any public discussion of these questions while they were the subject of diplomatic consideration. In view of this situation, I have determined that I could better serve the cause I have at heart—that is, the maintenance of peace in this country—by withholding any expression of my opinions so long as the questions at issue are the legitimate subject of diplomatic negotiations. I profoundly hope that no occasion will arise when I shall feel obliged to take these subjects up in a public way; but if perchance such an occasion should arise I will speak and act as I think. In the meantime, I shall give the President whatever support I can in the discharge of those duties devolved upon him by the Constitution. All through his service as President I have cooperated with him, and with all my heart I wish to continue that cooperation; and so I have concluded not to say anything at this juncture that might be misunderstood, especially in foreign capitals, and which might by any chance contribute to the difficulties with which the President is beset. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3331) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the use of interstate and foreign commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, this bill does not seem to me to guard the rights of the people. It seems to me to interpose an obstacle between the people and their right to the power which would be generated and the use to which the power would be put.

It struck me as significant—I do not know whether it will appeal to the Senate or not—that 67,000,000 people of this country, or about that number, are landless men. They are people without homes, people without a foot of the earth's possessions; and when we go to war, if we do go to war, if it is forced upon us by any other country or we angle for it ourselves, 67 men out of every 100 who will be called upon to fight the battles of this Nation are men who do not have one cent's interest in it. Here we are putting through a bill—and it will go through, despite any protest or any consideration of the rights of the majority of the people—we are putting through a measure which will deprive practically all of the people of the Nation from access to the water of the earth.

The timber has gone or is in the possession of a few people. The coal is in the same situation. The crude petroleum, from which gasoline is made, has risen in price within the last year from 30 cents a barrel to $1.30, according to testimony received by one of the committees of the Senate within a few days. The farmers' traction engine, the farmers' pump, the automobile, and the small, cheaper vehicle of the poor are now being tied up; and here the electric power of the people, the property of all of them, which was given to them by nature, along with the air of the earth, is to go into the hands of a few people, with a provision that at the expiration of 50 years their grandchildren may perhaps be granted the right to recover it, if they can. A 50 years' grant, with the right to recover, if they can, that which already belongs to them!

Such a measure does not appeal to me. I do not like to have a man take a thing which belongs to me and say, "After a while maybe, if you can do so—and we are leaving a fairly good weapon in your hands; we think it is a good one, a most excellent one—you may go out and fight to get it back." I have seen it tried. I have had experience with just such grants as this, and never yet have I seen the people get them back. They may do so in the future, and it may be that it is all right; but it does not look to me like a good obligation for us to place upon the people of this country.

For that reason I am opposed to it. I can understand how men who have not had experience with it might, for expediency's sake, wish to get this property immediately into the hands of private corporations and concerns for immediate development. But every man who looks into the future and wants that power for the people, who has had experience with it, knows that the people pay the price tenfold over for any such immediate advantage. For that reason I am opposed to it.

By the use of water power electricity will be produced at a cost of, say, four-eighths of a cent per kilowatt hour at the plant, on the average; a little bit less than that, if you please. And all down the line where the wires go to the consumer; and the less able to pay for it he is the greater price will he pay for that electricity, a price ranging from 3 cents to 15 cents per kilowatt hour will be collected for it. Those are the things which have happened and which do happen, which I have seen happen, and which I have had to contend with in my experience.

It is no favor to give the people a right to enter upon a fight to secure a title to property which is already theirs. I have offered an amendment. I fear my friends on the committee will consider it a substitute. It grants to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, all of whom are interested in this matter equally, but in different ways, to construct these dams and accessory works, and upon their completion to sell them to the States in which they are located, making the cost an obligation on those States, and the States in time to pay back, running through a period of 50 years, in equal annual payments, the actual cost, with interest, on deferred payments at 2 per cent. They will then be in the hands of the people of the States. They can use them for their benefit. The people will not rob themselves. They will not manage their own affairs in a way which will extort high rates for the use of power.

If there is any better way and anyone will suggest it, I am willing to accept it. I am not wedded to this theory; but it was the only way I saw by which I could secure a transference of the power and put it in the hands of the people to whom it belongs, with the General Government aiding them to carry on the work. So I submit it for those reasons, without making further comment upon it. I know objection will be raised to it even by Senators who believe in State rights. It will be scorned for the reason that it gives too much power over their property to the people. There will come a time, and I fear it is not far distant—at times it looks as though it was close at hand—when this country is going to need the help of the people. We are going to need their sympathy as well, and we ought to have their confidence. We are going, it may be, to need their life's blood to help protect us and our property and these vested rights. This is a good time to give them the right to use their own without putting a wedge between them and it.

Mr. President, I now submit the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 23, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That the United States hereby authorizes the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture to construct a dam or dams or diversion structures and accessory works for the development and improvement of navigation and for water power or other purposes across, in, or along any of the navigable waters of the United States: Provided, That when the power to be developed by the project and improvement of the stream for navigation is used or to be used for a public-utility purpose or purposes the grantee must be a State or a municipal corporation or a political subdivision of a State or a duly constituted commission of said State; but in any case where the State has not made provision for authorizing municipal corporations or political subdivisions of the State to engage in said business, the qualifications of the grantee prescribed in this proviso shall not apply.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture may grant a permit or permits for such dam or dams and accessory works upon the following conditions:

"First. The plans and specifications for such dam and all accessory works, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such maps of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Chief of Engineers, and when approved shall be made a part of such permit; and thereafter no change in such plans or specifications shall be made except as such change shall be approved and made a part of such permit by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers.

"SEC. 3. That the control of the level of the pools above and below such dam and of the currents developed therein and of the flow of the water over and past such dam and the operation of navigation facilities which shall be constructed as a part of or in connection with any such dam, whether at the expense of such grantee or of the United States, shall at all times be subject to such rules and regulations as shall be deemed by the Secretary of War to be reasonable and necessary in the interests of navigation.

"SEC. 4. That when a grantee hereunder is a State or a municipal corporation or a political subdivision of a State it may acquire the right to use or damage any lands or property of others necessary to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such dam or diversion structure or of the works appurtenant or accessory thereto by the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the district court of the United States for the district in which such land or other property may be located, or in the State courts. The practice and procedure in any action or proceeding brought for that purpose in the district court of the United States shall conform as nearly as may be with the practice and procedure in similar actions or proceedings in the courts of the State where the property is situated.

"SEC. 5. That this act shall not affect the rights of any person, company, or corporation as to the construction, maintenance, or operation of any structures heretofore constructed or upon which construction has been begun under permit or approval of the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers or other authority heretofore lawfully granted: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to irrigation or power dams or grants to municipal corporations affecting the use of water or water power for municipal purposes or to other projects approved or erected under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Agriculture upon the public lands of the United States.

"SEC. 6. That the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall issue a deed in fee simple to the State or States to such dam or dams and accessory works after the said State or States who have paid into the Treasury of the United States the actual cost of such dam or dams and accessory works: Provided, That the said payments by the State or States may be made in 50 equal annual installments, together with the payment of 2 per cent interest on deferred payments.

"SEC. 7. There is hereby appropriated, out of any funds not heretofore appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000 to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday's proceedings that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] offered an amendment to the bill. There was no discussion upon it and it was agreed to. I now move that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered, and if the Senate will allow me I would like to say just a few words as to the reasons why I make the motion.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was just going to say that the adoption in gross of all the amendments made as in the Committee of the Whole by the Senate would preclude the consideration of this amendment, unless the Senate will permit the Chair to make an additional statement. It was the intention of the Senator from Utah to reserve this particular amendment, but the matter was not called to the attention of the Chair at the time. The request of the Senator may modify the order heretofore made to the extent of permitting the Senate to consider this amendment in view of that statement.

Mr. WALSH. But the inquiry I was about to make was whether it would not be necessary to move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be dealt with by reserving it. It was the intention of the Senator from Utah to reserve it and it was overlooked at the time. Unless there is objection, the Senator from Utah will be recognized for the purpose indicated by him. The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] moved to strike out all after the word "applicant," on page 7, line 15, down to and including the word "applicant," line 20, of the reprint, as follows:

Which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant—

And to insert in lieu of those words:

Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

This has reference to section 2 of the bill, which provides:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War may grant a permit or permits for such dam or dams and accessory works upon the following conditions.

Then there are a great many conditions following that declaration. After the conditions are enumerated the bill provides that—

In fixing such conditions, or any of them, the Secretary of War shall also take into consideration the probable cost to such grantee of construction and maintenance and operation and the probable consumers' rate required to produce a reasonable return upon the investment required of such grantee. As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant—

Now, the Senator from West Virginia desires to have this language inserted:

Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

The bill as it now reads states that it shall be given to that applicant—

Which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or, if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant—

Mr. President, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, so far as the Western States are concerned, I wish to say that it would open the door to persons who have no other idea except the use of blackmail to extort money from the person who makes the first application for the permit. He may not be financially able to make use of the permit asked for. I know the amendment says "in good faith." Who is going to decide the question of "good faith"? A blackmailer may make it in good faith and do it for no other purpose except to hold up the man or the company that desires to install the electric system.

I know that the Senator from West Virginia had no such idea in offering the amendment. If the condition in his State is such that he thinks an amendment of this kind should be placed in the bill, I have no objection whatever if it is limited to West Virginia; but I certainly do object to having it apply to the States in which the great water powers are to be developed in the future, because I can see no good from it; but there is lurking in it a power for evil that can be used for the retarding of the development of water power in the Western States.

Mr. President, I think the bill as reported and amended covers the question correctly. I care not where the company may be organized; I care not where the power is to be created or the dam to be situated, if within any State, the applicant must have the certain rights granted him by the State in which the dam is to be built. He must have the grant of the State for the water; the United States can not give it to him. I believe that the provision of the bill covering this question is just and stated as plainly as it is possible to be. The applicant is to be given a permit which has first acquired the right to divert the water from the stream by means of the dam. This is a right which is given to him by the State, and I care not how many applicants may apply, but without such a right he should not be able to interfere with that right and can not in my opinion. The bill also provides:

If there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant.

That is fair; it is just. The terms of the lease are left entirely with the Secretary of War, but there should be an absolute, unqualified statement in the bill that the Secretary of War shall respect the rights of a State in granting a permit.

Mr. President, I sincerely trust the Senate, when this is called to their attention, will reconsider its action and defeat the amendment. As I said, and I say to the Senator from West Virginia now, if there is any condition in his State that his amendment is offered to cure, let the amendment apply to West Virginia alone, and not to the balance of the States of the Union.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I do not know that there is any situation in West Virginia that is peculiar to this amendment of mine. The amendment was offered in the best of faith to meet what I considered a weak point in the bill.

My amendment deals with that part of the bill which gives directions to the Secretary of War in determining which company shall have preference when there shall be competitors. My amendment would strike out, on page 7, line 15, after the word "applicant," the following:

Which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant—

And to insert:

Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, we might as well look at the situation as it is. The situation in the United States, so far as concerns water-power legislation, is that there has been a controversy for years as to whether or not the State could regulate water power or control it, or whether that was a matter which, in the end, would be relegated to the paramount power of the Federal Government. That has been offered as a reason why these water powers have not been developed. In fact it has been urged on this floor that the States could not go forward with the development of water power, and money would not be invested in such enterprises for the reason that every investor about to put his money into the enterprise fears that there is a paramount power vested by the Constitution of the United States in the Federal Government to come in at some time and disarrange everything the State might do. It is no use for us to try to evade that. The declaration of no Senator upon this floor can settle that question. It is there; it is a threat; and it is a matter which must hereafter be decided by some tribunal other than the Senate.

It does not make any difference what the State may do; it does not make any difference how much may be the investment under State law, investors will fear that ultimately the supreme power to control these matters under the interstate-commerce clause would be in the Federal Government. All the resolutions and speeches and declarations we may make here will not change it, and all the investments which are made under State laws will not modify it. It is a matter which in the end must be decided by the courts.

I do not charge any Senator, Mr. President, with so shaping this bill as to describe any existing condition. It is beyond the power of any human intelligence to describe what you might term negative conditions and not at the same time describe a condition that might be present in some State. There is no one who can here now write directions to the Secretary of War for choosing between rival applicants and not do an injustice. They might describe a condition in Montana, they might describe one in West Virginia, they might describe one in Maine. It would be certain to describe a condition somewhere. I believe the words of this section describe a condition in West Virginia. I believe they describe a condition in Virginia. I have not a particle of doubt they describe conditions in other States.

The language looks fair. I have no doubt it was intended to be fair by those who drafted the bill. We certainly are not preparing a bill here to suit some corporation already organized. It is not our purpose to say in the bill that we do not expect some kind of competition. When it shall come to the time when an officer of the Government shall make a decision, we want a bill that is fair to anyone who may apply for this great power under the National Government, fair to the people, fair to the States, and just to those who use the power that may be developed by the grant which we are giving.

Mr. President, this bill says that the preference shall be given to that company which has complied with the laws of the State in which the dam shall be located. So far as my State is concerned, you might as well write in there the Virginia Power Co. or the Appalachian Power Co. or some other company. I know from current history that some company has already complied with the laws of my State. I doubt not that some branch of some company has done the same in other States. They have done everything that the laws of the States require, but the public-service commission has not agreed with them about details, and they do not desire or are not willing to put in the immense sum of money required to develop the enterprise. This threat of Federal control and jurisdiction coming in afterwards may be one reason why the development has been delayed.

But when this bill is passed it, taken with the State laws, certainly does make every dollar invested in the enterprise safe, and you will find probably in more States than one that these words describe corporations which have already complied with the laws of the States, which will now, when the right is clear and beyond doubt, perfect organizations to go forward with the work. I therefore object to the language of the bill requiring the Secretary of War to give preference to existing corporations. We should give a free field and invite fair and open competition. Those who have felt that the Constitution gives the paramount power to the Federal Government over navigable streams, and who may have declined to risk their money under State charters, should not be precluded from competing for these valuable franchises.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is undoubtedly true, and the Senator will accept it as a fact, that in some of the States where this bill will operate the States have authority and do exercise the right to control the appropriation of water in the streams for power purposes or for any other purposes. In a case of that sort does the Senator think it was right to give the preference right under the bill to a corporation or a copartnership or an association that had not acquired from the State the right to divert the water in opposition to the man or the corporation that had acquired under the State law the right to divert the water?

Mr. CHILTON. With all respect to the Senator, of course not; but if the State did not have the full power to grant the franchise, and if there still be the paramount right under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution of the Federal Government to go in, then the fact that a State has claimed the power and has acted does not change the legal status. By passing this bill we concede that wherever and whenever interstate commerce shall be involved the power to control and regulate is a national function.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, he precludes the right of the State by this very amendment, because it says, in effect, that the Secretary of War shall disregard the compliance with the law of the State and shall simply sell the power to the party making the highest bid.

Mr. CHILTON. No; I prepared, yesterday morning, an amendment providing that there should be no permit granted hereunder until the authority from the State so to do was first obtained. I found that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had such an amendment. He was about to present it, and he did present it, and it was adopted yesterday, taking that question entirely out of controversy and fixing it beyond doubt.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, of course, undoubtedly knows that if the United States itself desires to use the water within a State for any purpose whatever outside of mere navigation it will have to make an application for it just the same as an individual or a corporation. It has to comply with the laws of the State just the same as an individual would, and if it wanted to divert water from any stream in the State it would have to follow exactly the same course as an individual or a corporation.

Mr. CHILTON. I will admit, Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state to the Senator from West Virginia that we are enforcing the rule today, so that debate may not be abused, and it must be uniformly and fairly enforced. The Senator has submitted to interruptions, which have taken the form of argument, and if he persists it will be necessary for him to surrender the floor under the rule which limits the right to speak twice on the same question.

Mr. CHILTON. I would rather be taken off the floor than be discourteous to a Senator. I should like, however, to present my views. The Senator says that, of course, the Senator from West Virginia knows so and so. The Senator from West Virginia does not know the dividing line under the Constitution of the United States between Federal control and State control, and he has given serious study to it. He has given as continuous study to it as probably any Senators upon the floor who have served no longer in this body. I had the honor of serving upon a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the then Senator from New York, Mr. Root, which committee made a report upon the rights of the United States in power developed by its improvement dams. That was one of the first duties which was assigned to me when I became a member of the Judiciary Committee. I did read the decisions, and, aided by the splendid attainments of my two colleagues on that subcommittee and their great ability as lawyers, I learned a great deal about the subject. I have studied the subject since. When we made our final report upon that question I recall that every member of the committee except us three disagreed from the conclusions to which we came. Our report is Document No. 246, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. We brought it up in the committee many times and discussed it as long as the time would permit, but the full committee never came to a conclusion. Several distinguished Senators upon the committee filed minority opinions, which were printed. It was probably a year after we filed the report that the Supreme Court of the United States adopted the principles of the report of that subcommittee, which, by the way, was written by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Therefore the matter has never been discussed any further in the Judiciary Committee.

But, Mr. President, I do not know, nor, with all respect to the Senator from Utah, does he know, where or how the courts will say interstate commerce shall inhere in navigation upon this part of a river or upon that part of a river. Much less can we say with certainty that we have the power to go as far as this bill goes. Navigation is nothing but floating upon water. You can not have navigation without water, and you do not always have navigation when you have water. We have nothing to do with the subject at all, except as that navigation shall be a part of interstate commerce. Whether or not the power of Congress shall begin at the head of the stream or whether Congress will have any power to deal with it until you get down upon the navigable parts of the river, I confess I do not know with any degree of certainty. I therefore want this bill so that there will be no doubt about it when I vote this power, whatever it is. The right granted by this bill with the power of the State will make a franchise. It gives something that is valuable, and I want to protect it. I want to see that my State is protected. I did not have any local situation in mind at all. I only knew that, in my judgment, it so happened that the description in the bill, not intentionally, seemed to fit certain companies that have already prepared themselves to take advantage of this legislation whenever the Government would make this grant. That is not fair, and you can not get a provision that will come nearer to what we are trying to do than the one I have offered. You might provide that the Secretary of War shall take this into consideration and take that into consideration; and then, when you go to apply that to this State or that, you have failed to meet the local situation. There is no safe way to give directions to the Secretary of War for choosing between competitors except in general language. The only fair way is to make it competitive, and that is what I have tried to do.

Mr. President, you never made competitive conditions in anything where it is not possible to say there was the power in somebody to hold somebody else up or to blackmail him. That is always true; you can not help that; but still you want competition. We in the Committee on Printing have to give notice to dealers and have to receive competitive bids. We do not know but that some man occasionally sells paper for less than it is worth, but fair competition is as near to justice as you can come. Justice, after all, to all kinds of humanity is but an approximation. Suggest a better way. Certainly the one that is in the bill is not as good as this one. That you shall grant the franchise to the company that offers the Government the best conditions for taking over the property and the lowest rate for service will appear to be fair to me till some good reason to the contrary shall be shown. Why is not that just? Why is not that fair to the people and fair to anybody who may want this franchise?

Then, upon the other hand, I can not imagine that any Senator upon this floor would vote that we should not give to a company this franchise if it would offer service, say, at one figure per kilowatt or horsepower or whatever may be the unit, when another would want to charge you a higher sum for it—certainly we would be recreant to our duty as representatives of the people if we did not put this up in some fair, legitimate way and allow that company which offers the best for the Government, the best for the people, and the best for the users of the product of this power to have the franchise.

I would like to vote for a water-power bill which is fair to all interests, and which would leave to the States those powers which, regardless of the granted powers in the Constitution, the States ought to exercise. I therefore voted for the amendment making it a condition precedent to the granting of a Federal permit hereunder, that the consent of the State in which the dam is located shall be first given. It is possible that the courts may finally hold that the jurisdiction of the Federal Government extends to the smaller streams which feed the navigable waters which carry interstate commerce. In that event, the State by this bill, before the amendment was voted, would be shorn of its power to regulate mill dams and sluiceways on the smaller streams. That would have made an unspeakable situation, and the amendment of the Senator from Missouri has prevented any such eventuality.

But the objection which my amendment covers is equally obnoxious to me. How any Senator can vote to compel the Secretary of War to favor a monopoly is beyond belief. This bill, if not amended, forces him to give preference to those who have already prepared, regardless of the rights and offers of competitors. At the end of 50 years the Government can take over the property of any grantee of this right, but the Government must pay for the property. Under my amendment the Secretary of War is to give preference to that company which shall offer, in good faith, the best terms to the Government for taking over the property. In other words, if this bill be not amended, and a company has already secured the right to build from the State, that company is to be preferred notwithstanding another company may offer to give the property to the Government at the end of the franchise. Is that giving the people a square deal? Again, this bill compels the Secretary of War to give preference to a company now ready under State law, although another company might be willing to furnish power at one-half the charge fixed by the public utilities commission. How can anyone vote against a "square deal"? What is a safer standard in granting a franchise than the most for the Government, the most for the public, and that to be ascertained by open competition?

I acquit the author of this bill of intentional favoritism. His high character makes that thought impossible. But it is plain to be seen that this bill does make a favorite of those companies which have already secured a status in a State. Whatever status they have obtained, was secured under State laws, which may or may not be of any lasting force. We come now to the framing of a bill which is to prescribe the terms of Federal consent. We should eradicate anything and everything which looks like favoritism. It is our duty to put every worthy competitor for a permit upon equal grounds. We are not responsible for what has been done by the States; but we have preserved the power of the States to veto any permit. But where the State grants a permit to more than one, this bill leaves us no room to deal with the competitors as to terms. First come, first served, is the rule laid down in the bill, and in many instances we know that we might as well write the names of the companies in the bill. The bill uses general language, but where there is but one which can qualify under the language used, how can we say that the bill is fair?

Mr. President, notwithstanding the platform pledge to develop water power, and my desire to do so, I can not satisfy my conscience to vote for this bill unless my amendment or one similar to it shall be adopted. I will not knowingly vote to fasten a monopoly upon the people of my country for 50 years.

The favoritism, which to my mind is so apparent in the language on page 7, is not an answer to any demand for water-power legislation. Better let the subject go over to another time than to pass this bill in its present form.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I share the concern of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wyoming, which prompted the former to again present the matter to the consideration of the Senate. It will be recalled that thinking the bill as it was originally framed did not meet the situation that the Senator from Utah has in mind, an amendment was incorporated upon my suggestion, which specifically gave to the first appropriator of the water the preference right as against a subsequent appropriator or one who had not appropriated. That is the correct principle when the two stand on a perfectly even footing, one having made an appropriation and the other having made no appropriation or having made a later appropriation, the preference, as a matter of course, should go to the one having made the first appropriation; but the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia presents the matter in quite a different point of view. He presents the case now of the earlier appropriator being an applicant for a permit and also the later appropriator, or one having made no appropriation at all, the later appropriator offering terms very much better than the earlier appropriator may have offered, both in respect to the charges and in respect to the terms under which the property is to be taken over at the end of the period. For instance, the later appropriator, or the man having made no appropriation at all, offers to furnish power at $20 per horsepower and the earlier appropriator offers to furnish it for $30 per horsepower. In that case the intention of the Senator from West Virginia is that the more favorable proposition shall be taken. Under those circumstances the later appropriator is up against the necessity of acquiring the rights of the earlier appropriator, and the only way he can do so is by a proceeding in eminent domain. It seems to me that that is the way that the matter should be left. It should be presented as a question of which offers the better terms and, of course, the later appro-priator will be obliged either to purchase from the earlier appropriator or to acquire his rights by eminent domain to make good his proffer.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether the later appropriator could maintain an action to condemn the right if he was proposing to use it for precisely the same purpose? As I understand, condemnation can only take place for a higher right, and in that way he would be prevented from maintaining an action of that sort. It seems to me that there could be no choice between two persons, where one of them already has a right under the State laws to appropriate the water and the other party has no right at all upon which he could act.

Mr. WALSH. That was just the proposition that I was going to present. It may be that the later appropriator would not even be able to invoke the right of eminent domain to acquire the right of the prior appropriator; in which case his permit would be useless to him; he could not reduce it to use; he could not have any use of it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I hope the Senator will pardon me for a moment. Of course, a water right may be condemned and utilized for public purposes; that is to say, rights used for agricultural purposes or for irrigation and owned privately may be condemned and utilized for a municipal supply and, doubtless, for other public purposes. Whether one utilizing water rights for purposes of irrigation could be subject to proceedings in eminent domain so that the water might be utilized for the development of power is a matter which, of course, depends upon the local law and regulation.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Montana a question. Would not the supposed case presented by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] bring up the very question that I suggested a moment ago, which would be whether or not the Federal Government had the right or the State had the right? Surely, no matter what right a man might have or a company might have in the State, if the paramount right to deal with this subject were vested in the Congress, and Congress should under this bill grant the permit, then the later company would have the right to condemn the land. There can be no doubt about that. After all, it is a question of where the jurisdiction is.

Mr. WALSH. If he did not have the right to condemn, his permit would not be of value.

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly not.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think, therefore, Mr. President, that there is just cause for apprehension such as is felt by the Senator from Utah, and which prompted him to offer this amendment. I am myself more concerned as to another possibility here, and that is the possibility of complete monopoly. If a corporation already operating many similar enterprises throughout the country, and in practical control of all like enterprises in a particular region, can offer just a little bit better terms than his rival—and ordinarily he is in a situation to do so—the award must be made to him. That is the only dangerous feature of the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia that addresses itself to me, and the more I think about it the more I am disposed to think that it is a peril in the amendment that probably was not contemplated by the Senator from West Virginia. Of course, the great, large company now occupying a position of advantage in this matter, controlling all of the developed power sites within an extensive region, having its transmission lines over an extensive territory, will be in a situation where it can offer better terms with respect to the undeveloped sites than can the ordinary competitor for that particular opportunity for development. There is that danger in the feature of the bill as it now stands, incorporated in it by the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, is the question now on the motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; a separate vote being desired on this particular amendment by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the question will be on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that is what I thought; but I wanted to be sure about it.

Mr. President, the provision as it is in the bill was adopted after very great consideration, after considerable discussion, and after several suggestions had been made to get the situation covered. It seems to me that the rule laid down in the bill is just about as definite and as certain a guidance to the Secretary of War as it can be, and it is also in the interests of the people. I myself think, as I have before said in the consideration of this measure, that we ought to make the conditions of the bill just as plain and definite as possible. We ought not to leave any more discretion to administrative officers than is absolutely necessary.

This provision which is proposed to be stricken out relates to a certain class of applicants. It goes into effect only "as between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to comply with the conditions imposed herein." If there are two applicants who come to the Secretary of War who are not equally qualified to comply with the law, then this provision, which it is proposed to strike out, does not apply at all. It is only where the Secretary of War finds that there are two applicants equally well qualified to carry out the purposes of this act that the provision that is to be stricken out applies.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. I suppose that could only occur where two applicants had an equal right to use the water of the stream. That is necessarily one of the qualifications, else he could not be granted a permit at all.

Mr. JONES. I am not so sure about that. I do not think that he would have to be actually in the possession of such rights in the stream if he could show that he was able to acquire them, not only financially but otherwise. I would think that if there were two applicants they would be considered equally well qualified, if that could be shown to the Secretary of War. At any rate, we have put in here a definite rule under which the Secretary of War is to decide between two equally well qualified applicants. The rule is that the applicant who has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream, and so forth, and has complied with the laws of the State, shall be given the preference. Now, if there are no State laws to be complied with, then the applicant who is first in point of time is given the preference. Under the amendment suggested by the Senator from West Virginia those provisions are stricken out, and a very wide discretion is left with the Secretary of War in determining the inducements offered by the various applicants as to what they will do 50 years from now.

One may offer better terms than the other with reference to rates to consumers. It occurs to me that under the provisions of this bill the consumers' rights are better protected than with a provision of that sort. In a State having a public-service commission, which would regulate the rates, suppose the company that makes the best proposition to the Secretary of War finds that its rates are too low and that it can not make any profit. It must go out of business and abandon its works, or else it must get some relief from the public-service commission. If the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia should prevail, and that condition of things were to come about, would we find that the public-service commission would not allow that company to change its rates and raise them? I suppose probably the permittee would be bound by his contract with the Secretary of War, and that his right to maintain the dam could be terminated, even though the public-service commission would be willing to allow him to raise his rates and should find that he was actually running his business at a loss, because it must not be forgotten that these terms and these conditions must be determined upon before the permittee starts on the work, even before the construction of the dam is begun.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. That is the significance of the words "under the provisions of this act" used in the amendment. The very point which the Senator now makes was thought of and discussed. It does not make any difference what the offer may be, or anything of that kind, the charges can not be higher than fixed by the public service commission of the State. The permit must be granted to the one offering the best terms; but it must be "under the provisions of this act," which provide for regulation and control by the State.

Mr. JONES. Very well. Then I submit that the amendment, so far as that is concerned, is absolutely useless, because the public-service commission will see to it that a permittee does not get any more than fair, just, and reasonable compensation.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will admonish the Senator that if he yields another time, he will forfeit his right to further address the Senate to-day on this particular amendment.

Mr. JONES. I do not know that I would care if I should forfeit that right. I have said about all that I care to say. I think it would be unwise to adopt the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I think we ought to relieve the Secretary of War just as much as we possibly can from any embarrassment that might come to him in determining between the different applicants for a permit. I have heard frequently in my service here of suggestions against this Secretary and that Secretary that he had favored this man or that man or this company or that company at the instance of some political influence or some improper influence. I do not believe that is the case; but I want to relieve the Secretary from such imputations just as much as I possibly can. I think we have laid down in this bill a clear, certain, definite rule to guide him, and one that will also protect the public interest and the people of the States. Now I yield to the Senator from California, as I have concluded.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California is recognized.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I did not want by any act of mine to take the Senator off the floor, but if he has concluded——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California has been recognized in his own right. He does not have to ask anybody's permission.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator seems to assume that the Secretary of War may fix the rates at the time of the contract. Does the Senator think so?

Mr. JONES. No; I do not.

Mr. WORKS. Are not the rates subject from that time on to regulation, either to be increased or decreased, by the State authorities?

Mr. JONES. I think so. That, however, was the only basis in favor of the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. It seemed to me, even if the Secretary did make a contract, that the public-service commission could regulate the rates.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, just one suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for such time as he thinks he may desire to occupy the floor, but he has addressed the Senate twice on this proposition.

Mr. CHILTON. Twice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. CHILTON. Then I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For what length of time does the Senator desire to address the Senate?

Mr. CHILTON. Not exceeding five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is recognized.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I did not know we were enforcing that rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be enforced until the pending bill is disposed of.

Mr. CHILTON. I am not criticizing the Chair. I think it a healthy sign, and I wish it would be enforced more frequently.

Mr. President, there is one suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as to this amendment which is worthy of serious consideration, and to which I gave consideration before I offered the amendment, and that is that it may tend to monopoly. You may say that practically about anything that is in this bill. Mr. President, if a large concern will give the people the best service at the lowest figure and will do the best for the Government, shall we say that it shall not be allowed to enter upon this work, or shall we put conditions in the bill that will protect the Government and protect the public service? The power of money and the power of great aggregations of capital can be controlled under the Sherman antitrust law or some other statute; but it would hardly do to say that they shall not bid, because sometimes they will be the only ones who will want to bid; they will be the only ones who will want to make an application for these permits. I have thought over all that, and I do not see anything in the world in this amendment that is not fair to everybody concerned. Monopoly may result from this bill, but my amendment provides its best antidote, which is competition. It seems to me that the Senate was right when, as in Committee of the Whole, it adopted the amendment, and I hope the amendment will be concurred in now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words in connection with this amendment.

I was greatly surprised on looking at the RECORD this morning to see that this amendment had been adopted. I do not recall when or under what circumstances it was adopted and went into the bill; but, Mr. President, I do not think there is any doubt whatever about the fact that, if this amendment remains in the bill as a part of the bill, it will almost entirely revolutionize and almost destroy the purpose for which the bill was framed.

This amendment, if it means anything, takes supervisory power away from the State commissions and from the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the power produced goes into interstate commerce, and reposes it in the Secretary of War. That is its inevitable effect, if it has any effect at all.

Another objection, Mr. President, to this amendment, to my mind, is that it will open the door wide and invite speculators or promoters or men of that class to seek franchises under the provisions of this amendment, although they may have no idea when they receive them that they will ever undertake development work. They simply want to get in, to get a claim, and then hold up some legitimate company that can under the provisions of this bill go on and make the development. They can hold up those who want to make such improvements until they are willing to be blackmailed, if that is a proper expression on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, after we have been considering this bill for 30 days, after every provision of it has been carefully examined and discussed by the ablest lawyers in the country, when every provision of it has been construed on the floor of the Senate, when every section of it has been construed with reference to its relation to other sections of the bill, it seems to me that it would ill befit the Senate to have this bill destroyed simply for the purpose of meeting an imaginary condition or situation which the Senator from West Virginia seems to think exists in his State. The amendment, of course, would apply to all the States; it would apply equally to every river in the country that is sought to be improved; it would apply equally to every station where power is sought to be developed, and, in my opinion, if the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia remains in the bill, it will mean almost the utter defeat of what we have intended to accomplish by the passage of the bill. I sincerely hope that the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the text——

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CHILTON. As I understand this provision, this amendment was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. I inquire what is the question on which the vote is to be taken?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been reserved, it comes up de novo, and the question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHILTON. I thought the question was on the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah made a motion to reconsider, but under the parliamentary status the question will be "Shall the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia be concurred in?" Those in favor of that will vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay." The Secretary will read the text as it will stand without the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, and then read it as it will exist in the event of the amendment being adopted.

The SECRETARY. Two amendments were inserted at this place on motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. As amended the text reads:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant.

It is now proposed to strike out those words and to insert the amendment following the word "applicant," so as to read:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. JONES called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the preceding vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COLT. I am paired, but on this matter I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Ashurst	Kenyon	Newlands	Stone
Chamberlain	Kern	Norris	Thompson
Gore	La Follette	Owen	Tillman
Hardwick	Lane	Poindexter	Vardaman

Chilton	Lewis	Shields	Weeks
Culberson	Lippitt	Shively
Dillingham	Lodge	Smith, Md.

So the amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was nonconcurred in.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I changed my vote for the purpose of being able to make a motion to reconsider. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri enters a motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. I simply desire to read to the Members who are now present the proposition that has just been defeated. I am sure many voted under a misapprehension. I read:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rate for public service under the provisions of this act.

That is to say, when the permit is about to be granted, preference shall be given to that applicant who offers the most favorable terms to the Government and who offers the most favorable terms to the public.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. REED. One moment. The amendment was accepted by the chairman of the committee, and went into the bill. It seems that the committee afterward declined to concur in the decision of the chairman of the committee, with the result that the Senate has now stricken from the bill a provision which simply provided that in giving these permits preference shall be given to that applicant who offers the most favorable terms to the public and to the Government.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, and to whom?

Mr. REED. I think I ought to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who rose first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sees several Senators present who are not familiar with the rule under which we are working to-day. It is a rule which was established within the last few years, namely, that when a Senator yields for more than a simple question the second time he forfeits the floor.

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply desire to propound a question for information. I will ask the Senator if this language is a substitute for language stricken from the bill; and if so, what it is? I desire to vote intelligently, and I have been forced to be absent during part of the day.

Mr. REED. The bill as it stood before the amendment——

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from what page he is reading?

Mr. REED. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at page 3680.

Mr. SMOOT. Page 7 of the bill.

Mr. REED. The bill as it stood before the amendment read as follows:

> Shall give preference to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought, and otherwise complied with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or diversion structure is to be constructed, or, if there are no State laws to be complied with, the preference shall be given to the first applicant.

The motion was to strike that out and to insert:

> Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

It will be noted that the substitute affects both the people and the Government—the Government at the end of the 50-year term, the people during the 50-year term.

The substitute having been defeated, I made the motion to reconsider simply in order that I might make this statement and that those who were out of the Chamber and may have voted inadvertently might have the facts before them. I only wanted to say that much.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I may have been mistaken, but I understood that the action just taken was upon a motion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to reconsider the vote——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; it did not come in that way. The amendment was reserved, and the vote came directly. This is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, and I shall feel constrained to vote against it during the further consideration of the matter.

The great vice of this bill is the unlimited discretion with which it clothes the Secretary of War. When this paragraph was before the Senate I tried very hard to secure an amendment the effect of which was that if the applicants were equally well qualified to do the work the preference should be given to the first applicant. I believe that is an essential. I do not intend by my vote to give the Secretary of War the right to take applications for this permission, hold them indefinitely, and then decide as between them who ought to have the permission. It is too dangerous, as it seems to me.

If the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia had not eliminated that part of the bill, which was adopted by the Senate after considerable discussion, and, I thought, for a very good reason, I might have been tempted to support his amendment, because it announces, generally speaking, a good principle; and yet it is very likely to keep the promise to the ear and break it to the hope.

The bill as it is now provides a definite rule for the ascertainment of the value of the property that is to be taken over by the Government at the end of the franchise. There is, in my opinion, no way in which that rule can be avoided unless the bill itself is changed. I tried, as Senators know, very tediously, but unsuccessfully, to secure some change in that rule that would make it more just to the people. So far as the terms of the service are concerned, there is not a Senator here who does not know that no agreement with regard to terms running throughout a period of 50 years can be made. It will be a barren right to the Secretary of War.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sorry to say, Mr. President, that under the ruling made by the Chair I can not yield, unless it is for a simple question.

Mr. REED. A simple question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question, assuming that it will not deprive me of the floor, although I am about ready to yield the floor.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that in making a proposition to the Government with reference to terms it could not be made in the form of a rule or principle by which the rates should be determined?

Mr. CUMMINS. I very much doubt it, Mr. President, under the terms of this bill; but even if there were no doubt with regard to that subject, I am not willing to clothe the Secretary of War with the authority to say what are the most favorable terms as to ascertaining the value of the property 50 years in advance. I find myself differing widely from the Senator from Tennessee with respect to that subject. He thinks that the rule that is in the measure now is the most favorable rule, the fairest rule for the ascertainment of value. I do not; and I am unwilling to say to the Secretary of War that he can agree with the applicant upon a rule for the ascertainment of value, for he may be as blind to reason as I think the Senator from Tennessee is blind to the equities of the matter.

For these reasons, and because where honorable, reputable applicants appear before the Secretary of War equally qualified to discharge the duty that is to be imposed upon them or to develop the enterprise that is involved I think the applicant first in time ought to receive the permission, and that it is far better to guard against excessive charges for service through the constituted authorities of the State and the United States than it is to submit that matter to the Secretary of War for an agreement lasting over a period of 50 years or more, I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield the floor?

Mr. CUMMINS. I had yielded the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection that the Chair can see, then, to the Senator answering the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wondered why the President pro tempore asked me the question, inasmuch as I had yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada desires to address an inquiry to the Senator from Iowa. He can answer it or not, as suits him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Chair allow me to answer the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a question of the Chair allowing the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to do it, if I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask the Senator, who states his objection as to the part of the amendment that relates to the better rate that is to be secured to consumers, whether he applies the same objection to the portion of this amendment which relates to the final terms upon which the property is to be turned over to the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not attempt to rank in persuasive power or in dignity the two objections that I made to the amendment. I do not believe that either of those things ought to be determined by the Secretary of War—one to be carried out after a period of 50 years and the other to be carried out during the period of 50 years. For the former we have adopted a standard—I think, a very unjust standard. For the latter, the protection to the people against excessive rates, in my judgment, we will be compelled to depend upon the general power of the Government; and I would not want an agreement entered into by the Secretary of War and the applicant to be persuasive or potential upon the public authorities after a period of 25 years had elapsed. I think an agreement of that sort might practically destroy the benefits of control and regulation of the service.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not vote upon this last amendment, because I came in too late to understand the purport of the amendment; but the amendment, as I understand, reads:

> Preference shall be given to that applicant which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise—

There could not be any objection to that amendment thus far, in my mind—> and the lowest rate for public service under the provisions of this act.

Do I understand that the Senator who is urging this amendment assumes that the Secretary of War would enter into a contract fixing rates for any particular length of time?

That is a very vital matter to the Western States. In the first place, I do not think we could do such a thing. In the second place, it would be unwise, as a matter of policy, to undertake to do it. The matter of fixing rates ought to be left entirely to the rate-fixing power within the State, unless it is interstate carrying, and then it should be left to the body which is provided for the purpose of fixing such rates.

I do not want to record any vote here which would seem to indorse the proposition that the rate-fixing power can be lodged in any Secretary—the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Interior—here in Washington. I presume that is what this amendment is undertaking to do. While I do not think, as a matter of law, we could do it, I have no desire to indorse the policy, even if we had the power to do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on this matter.

I voted for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia under a misapprehension. If the Senator's proposition stood alone, and was considered without any reference to the balance of the bill, a vote in the affirmative would be the only vote that any Senator could cast. But when it is recalled that in the bill itself provision is made that these rates shall be controlled by the public-service commissions in each State, and when it is further remembered that in other parts of the bill provision is made that the property shall be paid for at its fair value at the expiration of the franchise, then it becomes apparent that by adopting the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia we would completely destroy the theory of the bill elsewhere. We would set up in the Secretary of War the right to pass on these rates, whereas the bill intended to put that right in each State.

Therefore, having voted under a misapprehension, and having voted for a proposition as to which, standing alone and considered alone, the right would apparently be on one side of it, I think the Senate, when it considers the matter, will vote the other way. I will change my vote, I know.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, if any Senator is supporting this amendment under the belief that the Secretary of War can fix or control the rates to be charged for the power, either by contract or by rule, he is laboring under an error. That power belongs absolutely and exclusively to the States. The Secretary of War has no such power, as I have contended heretofore, and Congress can not vest him with any such power. It is a part of the sovereign power of the State.

The Secretary of War may impose conditions that are not satisfactory to the State and thereby defeat the whole project, and the State may do precisely the same thing; but whenever the dam is constructed, and the power is to be supplied, then it comes immediately under the control of the State. The State may not only fix the rates to be charged for the power, but it may determine that the water shall be used for some other purpose, notwithstanding any control that may be made by the Secretary of War; for example, for irrigation.

So I hope Senators will not support this amendment upon any theory or belief that the Secretary of War has any such power.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is adopted, it will be at variance with other parts of the bill and particularly with that part which provides that interstate rates are to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No one will doubt but that the State has a perfect right to fix the rates charged within the State. The Senator's amendment provides that a preference right shall be given to that applicant "which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act."

Mr. President, that simply means that there will be a conflict of authority. The Secretary of War has no authority whatever to fix rates within a State, and the bill is so framed. If interstate rates, they are to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and not by the Secretary of War.

If Senators will consider for a moment the provisions of the bill as reported to the Senate, they will see that the preference right shall be given to the applicant having met the following State requirements: First, the applicant must acquire the right to divert the water of a stream by means of a dam. That right is secured from the State, and the State must grant the right for that purpose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in just a moment. Next, the applicant must otherwise comply with the laws of the State or States in which the dam or the diversion structure is to be constructed. Those are the two requirements as provided in the bill as reported. But before the Secretary of War is authorized to grant the permit certain State laws must be complied with. The amendment of the Senator from West Virginia authorizes the Secretary of War to grant the preference right to the one which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise. If that was all the amendment, nobody would object, but that is not the part of the amendment that is objectionable.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. For a question.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Utah want the Senate to understand that if two applicants came before the Secretary of War asking for a franchise and one of them said that it would furnish electric light at 10 cents per kilowatt hour and another said he would furnish it at 5 cents per kilowatt hour, and thereupon the permit was to be given to the man who specified 5 cents as the price, that that would in any manner deprive a public-service board of the power to make a further lower rate? Would it not simply be a limit upon the cupidity of the corporation? Would not the public-service commission be at liberty to go as much lower as they pleased, whereas at the same time the grantee could not go above the rate he had contracted as his maximum?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Why not?

Mr. SMOOT. For the reason that neither Congress nor the Secretary of War could delegate such power to an individual or a State. The Senator must admit that that power can not be delegated by Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. SMOOT. For a question only.

Mr. REED. For a question. Does the Senator mean to say that when we authorize the Secretary of War to make one of these contracts the contract can not contain provisions favorable to the people as a matter of contract, and that those favorable conditions bind the contractor so that he can not violate them and yet enjoy his privilege?

Mr. SMOOT. The binding of the contractor according to any agreement made by the Secretary of War will not release him from the absolute control of a State commission that has that power of control.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The questions of the Senator from Missouri are growing slightly elaborate. Still the Chair has not insisted upon enforcing the rule.

Mr. REED. I do not want to exhaust the patience of the Senate or trench upon any rule. I will try to make my questions as concrete as I can if the Senator will yield for a further question.

Mr. SMOOT. For a question only, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that if a man comes to the Government and asks for a permit and in that permit fixes a maximum price, he can not by his contract thus made bind himself not to go above that price?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President, with the Government of the United States he can; but that is not the question involved here. The question involved, if the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia is adopted, gives the right to the Secretary of War to name rates within a State by agreement with the permittee, and that can not be done, in my opinion. Mr. President, I do not care to take any more time on this question.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just one moment, if the Senator will permit me. The Senator from Missouri made a statement that the chairman of the committee had agreed to the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the position of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] was as follows: The Senator from Missouri, as I stated heretofore to the Senate, offered an amendment, and the Senator from Tennessee said that he had no objection to make to that amendment. It was therefore adopted, as in Committee of the Whole. I then introduced the amendment which is now under discussion, and the Senator from Tennessee simply said that he himself had no objection to it, but he was stating his own personal views about the matter and did not pretend to state what the committee would think about it or what might be any action of the committee. I have no doubt the Senator from Missouri overlooked that, and in good faith thought he was stating what had occurred. I do not claim anything for that. I do not want to plead any baby act about it. If it can not stand on two legs and do its own talking, I am sure it will never get through by what its sponsor on this floor can say for it.

But I would like to have the Senate understand what the amendment is and what it means before it votes upon it. I to-day addressed the Senate a little more at length than I am now going to do in trying to explain what it means and the reason I had for introducing it, but of course many Senators were away attending to official business. Then they came here on a roll call and afterwards many of them went away, as Senators generally do, to their committees. So I feel that this proposition of mine has really never been presented to the body that must in the end vote upon it. I therefore should like to have the attention of the Senate to present what the proposition is.

Now, let us see what we are amending. It is a matter of no consequence to me whether the amendment shall be adopted or not. I would not vote for the bill if it has not the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri and this amendment. That is my own feeling about the matter, and it is fixed. Here is the proposed law as it is without the amendment:

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to comply with the conditions imposed herein, preference—> preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam.

That is, in part, an amendment itself to the original bill. The original bill provided that the permit should be given to the one who first complied with the laws of the State. That was amended as in Committee of the Whole, and the words that preference should be given to that applicant who first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of a dam were inserted. In all candor, tell me what that means. What are we voting for when we command the Secretary of War to give to the contesting applicants which have first acquired the right under the laws of the State, I take it, "to divert the water"? I submit, Mr. President, that that is unintelligible. It is not a direction which can be said to be fair or clear.

Awhile ago, when but few were here, I called the Senate's attention to the fact that there is a condition in some of the States which makes that language absolutely descriptive of the monopoly which has been talked about upon the floor of the Senate. As I explained a few moments ago, I am not going to undertake to disentangle or try to explain here what no one can explain under the decisions as they are now—where a Federal power begins and where State power begins, or where the one ends and the other begins. No one knows so as to satisfy himself on every phase of this legislation. We have studied that question, we have worked on it. Each of us has his own idea. Some of our friends from the West talk about the right to take water. We do not understand that here in the East. Everyone has the right to take water in our part of the country. We do not understand this thing of selling water and appropriating water and water rights like they do in the West; but we do understand the language of monopoly. We do understand, as they do, what is justice. We do understand the danger in using the word "preference" when you give a great permit involving the power of the Federal Government superior, possibly, to the power of the State. Certainly so if the contentions of some Senators be correct.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, and I will repeat it, because I have a better audience now than I had then, if the State, as is claimed by our friends in the West, have the right to grant these permits, if the power be in them and not in the Federal Government, what we may do here can not hurt or help any situation; but if, as it seems to me, those who are going to put the money in these propositions suspect, possibly believe, that the paramount power is in the Federal Government under the interstate-commerce clause, and that when we enter upon the exercise of that power by granting rights, ours will be held by the courts to be the superior power. This law will be the chart rather than the law of the State. If that may be a possibility, we should be careful. I confess I do not know how to describe a "preference." I do not know how to use English that will describe it in a way that will be fair to the Government, fair to the generations that will follow and to this generation, and fair to the users of the product of these public-service corporations. I do not know how to use language that will make a preference that will be fair to everyone, and I do not think it is in the power of any Senator upon the floor to select that language so as to be sure that some one is not lying in wait to get an advantage——

Mr. REED. Preference is an absolute right.

Mr. CHILTON. A preference, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, here means an absolute right.

I said a moment ago this language, in my judgment, would be no plainer and no clearer, so far as some of the States that I know something about are concerned, if instead of saying the first one that "acquired the right to divert the water," it would just say the preference shall be given to the Appalachian Power Co. Why? Because it has already, under the laws of the State, acquired the right to divert the water so far as the State can give it. In others it might as well say the Virginia Power Co. Why? Because it has already, before other investors knew that the Federal Government would act, acquired the right, so far as the States can give it, to divert the water in the streams.

I know that no Senator wants to do this. I absolutely acquit the author of the bill of any such intention, or the committee which reported it of any such purpose. Yet that only shows the vice of trying to describe a preference so as to be just to everybody who has a right to be consulted before you shall give that preference. I know of no way of giving a preference except to give it in the language of the fathers, in the language of justice, by giving the preference to him who gives you the best terms.

Mr. President, the days of angels on earth are past. When you talk about giving a preference somebody must decide it. It must be a human being. It must be the court or Congress or some executive officer. Think what this direction would be to an officer who wanted to do wrong. His directions, upon the one hand, should be to give preference to him who had the "right to divert the water," and then put alongside the broad language of my amendment, which prefers him who shall give the Government the best terms when the time comes that future generations and this Government will be most vitally interested in taking over this property.

Mr. President, there is one other point to which I want to invite seriously the attention of the Senate. When I prepared this amendment I had not been much upon the floor of the Senate while the debate was going on. I was engaged in other duties, in a hearing under the direction of the Judiciary Committee, and I could not stay upon the floor and hear all the amendments. I had to come here when I could and gather the legislative stages as best I could.

I found that there had been an amendment, the one to which I have just called the attention of the Senate, and it was running in my mind to correct it further. I drew my amendment, leaving out the last six words, "under the provisions of this act," so that my amendment read that—preference shall be given to that applicant which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rates for public service under the franchise.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], always, in my judgment, trying to conserve any proper interest and always willing to be fair, suggested the very point which is now being urged by the Senator from Utah. He said that the bill allows the States to control through their public-service commission, and my amendment has put in a direction that possibly might be construed to repeal or to be in conflict with that former provision. He said, "I would not object, so far as I am personally concerned, if you will put in there 'under the provisions of this act,' so that whatever the Secretary of War might do as to rates, whatever proposition might be offered by the permittee as to rates, would still have over it the provisions of this act, which are that the public-service commission shall control in the end." In other words, my amendment was changed to suit the Senator from Tennessee and to meet the objection now made.

Mr. President, I can not think that anyone who considers this matter carefully and seriously can urge the point of the Senator from Utah. Let us see what it means. The Secretary of War shall give preference to him or it which shall offer the lowest rates for public service. That, of course, means a maximum rate still subject, because it is "under the provisions of this act," to be regulated still further by the public-service commission; but always down, of course, because if the public-service commission should make a rate, still you have the agreement of this permittee that it shall be the "lowest rate" that they shall offer. If they would offer 10, say, per unit, still there would be the power of the public-service commission to go to 8 or 9 or 7, but not power to go to 11, 12, or 13. In other words, you have a maximum rate fixed here that prevents a corrupt or an ignorant public-service commission from going above the rate fixed and agreed to.

There is not a single thing that has been urged against this amendment that has not been provided for. It does not take away from the public-service commissions of the States any power they have except the power to go higher than may be provided in the permit. That is all there is to it. It is a simple, plain proposition: Shall the Senate of the United States vote for a preference which no one on this floor, I submit, can define and tell you where it will lead, what it describes or what it does not describe, and vote down this provision to protect present and future generations, to protect the public, and to prevent, if language can do it, a monopoly in this business?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] has stated what occurred between the Senator from Tennessee and himself correctly. This amendment was never printed. The Senator from West Virginia had one amendment which he presented to me, and we did not reach an agreement upon it. Then the present amendment without the words "under the provisions of this act" was written by the Senator from West Virginia on the floor while other matters were being considered and presented to me and read. I suggested the adding of those words, and they were written in by the Senator from West Virginia. The matter was somewhat hurriedly, so far as I was concerned, disposed of. There were other amendments pending, and of course the amendment was not given that deliberate consideration which it would have received if it had been previously presented to me and examined. I told the Senator from West Virginia, as he has stated, that I would not oppose the amendment. I did not agree to it; I had no authority to agree to it; I had not consulted the committee about it. I construed it at the time as not changing two of the most important provisions of the bill, but which, I understand, it is now insisted it does change; that is, that it gives the Secretary of War a discretion or authority to fix the rates for the power produced at these dams. It was never intended, in my mind, to have that effect.

There is an express provision in the bill that where the power goes into domestic commerce the rates be fixed by the State public-service commissions, and where it goes into interstate commerce by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was not intended by the bill to give the Secretary of War any authority whatever over rates. The whole frame of the bill is against such an idea. That idea was advanced at one time in the consideration of the bill, but it was stricken out and the present provisions written excluding the Secretary of War from any authority whatever over rates.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] presented an amendment which was adopted just before this one, and which is in these words:

That before the permit shall be granted under this act the permittee shall first obtain, in such manner as may be required by the laws of the States, consent of the State or States in which the dam or other structure for the development of the water power is proposed to be constructed.

In my opinion, the bill without this amendment, so provided, and in all cases the permittee expressly made subject to the laws of the State in constructing his dam and in conducting his business, which covered and included fixing rates, because that is a matter for State regulation and for State control. This is made prominent in the bill. It was never intended that any other authority should fix rates or have any control over them, except in interstate and foreign commerce.

The bill also contains an express provision for the ascertainment of the value of the property when it is taken over by the United States. It is provided that the fair value shall be paid, excluding any value that might attach to the permit. That section was attempted to be amended by no less, as I now remember, than six proposed amendments, all of which were voted down. It was the intention of the committee at all times that that proviso should control the fixing of the value. It was to be done by mutual agreement between the company and the Secretary of War, or, upon their failure to agree, by resort to the courts.

If, as is argued, the Secretary of War has any authority under this section either to fix rates or to fix the value of the property taken over it is in conflict with the express provisions of the bill to which I have referred and will produce confusion and conflict of authority, and it was never intended to have that effect.

I like the bill as it is written better than I do the amendment, although it was not written by me. There was another provision in the bill upon the subject, but an amendment was offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and in the discussion that followed the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made some suggestions and offered to amend his amendment, and that was followed by a suggestion from the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. Finally, the words stricken out were agreed to upon the floor in that discussion, and were inserted instead of the language of the bill as originally reported; but the words then agreed upon, and now stricken out, were consistent with the other provisions of the bill.

The only agreement—and the Senator from West Virginia very properly corrected a statement made by inadvertence upon the subject by the Senator from Missouri—was that I would not oppose the amendment. I did not oppose it; I did not agree to it. If I had understood the effect now insisted upon that it would override the two provisions of the bill to which I have referred, I would not have made any such agreement, but would have actively opposed it. I then believed and have the belief that the express provisions of the bill concerning the authority to fix rates and the value of property taken are controlling and will not be affected by the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield the floor.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question, but I can not do so if the Senator sits down.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] would make it impossible for a company to develop a power plant under this bill. While I am not perfectly familiar with the method by which such a company would operate and fix its charges, it seems to me that an applicant for a permit to maintain a dam and distribute power for 50 years in a given section of the country, in competing with another company for the same privilege, could not make any responsible contract or agreement with the Secretary of War covering all the conditions which would occur during that period. If they put in a dam and develop a plant, nobody can conceive of the territory over which they may deliver hydroelectric power during the next 50 years. Some of it will be sent to points perhaps 10 or 20 miles away, or to whatever distance improved methods of transmission may show to be practicable. The scientific discoveries which may be made in the future in relation to the production and distribution of electricity may be such that the man who now is asked to bind himself for 50 years will be utterly incapable of foreseeing the effect of the contract that he will be called upon to enter into with the Government. I can conceive that, owing to some ingenious invention or device in the distribution of electricity, the process of transmitting electric power for long distances may be so perfected that leakage will practically amount to nothing; and I can conceive that possibly the present rates per kilowatt, or whatever the measure is, would increase or decrease in geometrical ratio according to the distance that the power is carried and the use to which it is to be put. Altogether, it seems to me, the conditions are so complicated that to ask an applicant to bind himself and give bond for the carrying out of an agreement of that kind for the next 50 years would be practically to prevent capital from going into this industry and developing power at all. I may be entirely wrong about that, not being skilled in that line, but I should like to see the power——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know of a single franchise that is granted by any municipality or any State where the applicant for the franchise does not bind himself to certain terms and conditions in the contract itself? Is that not true in connection with water, gas, street railway, electric light, and other franchises of every kind? And does not the Senator know that such terms enter into all franchises of that character, unless, indeed, there are a lot of gentlemen representing the municipality who also represent the corporation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I am not familiar with any such gentlemen.

Mr. REED. I did not mean that the Senator was. I know the Senator will not take it that way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator asks me if I know of a particular case where those seeking a franchise are not required to enter into contracts. I do not know of any instance of that kind. I am not talking about a gas company in a locality where a franchise may be granted by the common council affecting an industry in which the conditions have become established and become known. I am talking about entering upon the development of what is comparatively a new agency, a force of nature. We are entering upon a new policy, and it seems to me, as I said before, that the proposition to throw two competing parties on the judgment of the Secretary of War and his discretion, he not being a particularly technical man in the business and not, perhaps, of a judicial temperament at all, to decide as between two competitors upon the mere assertion of one that he will supply power at cheaper rates than the other would be very unwise.

Furthermore, I do not concede it to be so simple a proposition as would be indicated by an illustration of this kind: One applicant says: "I will furnish it for 5 cents a kilowatt hour, how much will you furnish it for?" The other applicant says, "4 cents," and then the Secretary of War must give the permit to the second applicant, because he has named a lower rate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In just a moment. I conceive that the conditions will be so infinitely varied that such a proposition would not control the situation at all. Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator thinks that the question of who offers the lowest rate is too delicate and intricate a question for the Secretary of War to pass upon?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I did not. I say that is a thing that can practically be determined by the Secretary of War; but the question is not simply one of the lowest rates. The question of the best terms for the General Government and for the public, as I understand, is involved.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, let me call the Senator's attention to this language which is in the bill——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know there is altogether too much discretion granted to the Secretary of War.

Mr. REED. For which the Senator voted and which is not objected to—

> As between contesting applicants for a permit hereunder having the legal qualifications required by this act, and being equally well qualified to improve or develop waterways for the uses of interstate or foreign commerce, preference shall be given to that applicant which is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region; and as between such contesting applicants which appear equally well qualified in such respect, then preference shall be given to that applicant.

Under the amendment now pending would come in the words "which offers the best terms to the Government and to the people." I want to ask the Senator if the questions put up to the Secretary of War by the bill without amendment, to wit, Which of the applicants is best qualified to improve or develop waterways, which of the applicants is best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region, are not much more intricate and do not require much more technical skill than to find as a fact that one applicant has offered terms which are cheaper to the general public than another may have offered?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In my opinion, not at all, Mr. President. It would be a comparatively simple matter for any administrator who had any business experience whatever to tell who was the most reliable of the various applicants, who was best adapted and best equipped to carry out the agreement which he had offered to make. The other question is entirely different. The rates may change from day to day or from year to year during the next 50 years, depending upon the cost of the material necessary to maintain the plant and the cost of distribution. To say now that a man must make a contract that during the next 50 years he will not raise the prices per kilowatt-hour so as to pay a fair return upon the capital that he may be required to invest and the new capital that he may be required to put in would be utterly improvident, in my opinion. The public-service commissions of the States are given jurisdiction of the question of making rates. Suppose it is the custom of other companies that are competing with a company operating under this bill to charge higher rates, and suppose the public-service commission finds that the rates ought to be raised, and that the power plant could not keep the agreement it has made with the Government without going into bankruptcy. I say those considerations, in my mind, would operate to defeat the development of our water powers, which this bill is designed to encourage.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] showed me this amendment at first, I glanced at it casually, and I was under the impression then that it was a bad and vicious amendment; but I made the remark to the Senator: "It is something that we can eliminate in conference. We have had such a long and tedious struggle on this bill that perhaps, to save time, we might let it go in and then dispose of it in conference."

While I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, which has reported this bill, and a member of the subcommittee that has aided in formulating and preparing the bill, I have, as Senators know, avoided, as much as possible, taking up the time of the Senate in this debate. I have been anxious to have the bill passed, because I thought it was one of the most important measures that we could pass at this session.

The bill proceeds on the theory that the States, not the War Department, are to regulate the rates. It is only in a case where it relates to interstate commerce that the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction.

What is this amendment? It is as follows:

Which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise—

That is the first proposition. Now, how in the world can any Secretary of War or anybody else, at the beginning, before it is known what the plant is going to be and what the property is going to be, fix the terms on which the property will be taken over? It is utterly impracticable and out of all reason.

Here comes a company or an individual and says, "I want a franchise to construct a dam here." You never know at the beginning exactly what that plant will be in the end, and it is utterly impossible for the Secretary of War and the applicant to fix or agree upon any price.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I decline to yield.

Mr. CHILTON. All right.

Mr. NELSON. I decline because I have taken up very little time, and the Senator has had lots of time on this matter.

Now, as to the other proposition:

And the lowest rates for public service under the franchise under the provisions of this act.

What does that amount to? Are we to be trifled with? The Secretary of War and the applicant have no power to make a binding contract. There is nothing in the bill that would warrant them in doing so; and if the applicant said, "I will furnish it at that rate," the Secretary of War has no authority to agree with him on that rate. So that part of the amendment is simply a Pope's bull against the comet, and nothing else.

I admit that it is rather captivating to men who do not understand it; but it ought to be perfectly plain to anybody who gives the matter clear consideration that the Secretary of War, having no power to make such a contract, the proposition of the man saying "I will furnish the power at such a price" is of no consequence, because he can change the rate at any time if you make him immune from State control. It amounts to nothing at all.

Therefore, for the reasons I have stated—first, because it is impracticable and impossible to adjust, 50 years ahead, the basis on which the property ought to be disposed of at the termination of the franchise, since no one can tell in what condition the property will be or at what rate it ought to be turned over to the Government; and, in the next place, because there is no power in the Secretary of War to make a binding rate, and whatever proposition the applicant might make in respect to a rate would amount to nothing at all—there is nothing in the amendment, and it ought to be rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am astonished that Senators advance the argument we have just heard, because a moment's consideration will show that it is unsound.

To begin with, nobody can build a dam across a navigable stream until he gets a governmental permit. We undertake by this bill to vest in the Secretary of War the authority to exact certain terms and conditions upon which such permit shall be granted; yet, if the argument of the Senator from Minnesota is correct, when we undertake to give that power to the Secretary it is null and void, because he has no power to make a contract. Of course, if he has no power to contract, then all the provisions of the bill seeking to vest him with discretion and power are absurd.

What are the facts? The facts are that the Secretary of War is given by the bill, first, permission to grant the permit; second, the power to grant the permit to one person in preference to another; third, the power to exact conditions. In a word, we undoubtedly give him the power to make a contract; and when we give him the power to make that contract the contract will bind the man who accepts it and thereupon builds a dam. The grantee can not accept the benefits of a contract and then repudiate its obligations.

Mr. President, we can confer the power upon the Secretary of War to exact a contract which will safeguard the rights of the public and yet not deprive a State of a single iota of its power of regulation and control. When a city council grants to a street-railway company a franchise to put its tracks in the streets of a city, no matter what terms may be written in that contract, there is still under most constitutions a right on the part of the public to further reduce the charges if they are unjust. But if the builder of the street railway has agreed upon a maximum charge he can not break his contract and charge a higher rate than the maximum he has agreed to take. Accordingly, when these gentlemen come in and ask for a franchise from the Federal Government to put in a dam it can be granted to them upon the condition that they will not charge more than a certain rate. That will bind them; but the State can make a reduction below the maximum whenever it can show that the charges are unjust. The grantee is bound by the maximum he has stated in his contract, but the people of the State are not bound to pay the maximum if it be unjust.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. While that is true, what is the necessity of having any such power as that vested in the Secretary of War when full, ample power is vested in every State commission and in the Interstate Commerce Commission to control and regulate the rates?

Mr. REED. I shall answer the Senator. When two parties are bidding against each other for a new franchise, the experience of every American city shows that it can get a better rate under those competitive conditions than you can ever get by regulation. The experience of every American city shows that, and shows it conclusively. I have the utmost respect for and confidence in the Senator in charge of the bill. I ask him to examine the language of the bill as it will stand with the amendment stricken out. I read:

Preference shall be given to that applicant which has first acquired the right to divert the water of the stream by means of the dam, to erect which the permit is sought.

I ask the Senator, What does that language standing alone mean? Surely it means that the man who gets the first right from an authority has the absolute right to demand that the Secretary of War shall issue his permit. And this is true even though he may have under some general statute of a State acquired a right to build a dam. It does not mean anything else than that. It means that if A comes in and offers the most favorable terms to the public, but B has obtained a prior right from a State, preference shall be given to the man who has the prior right, regardless of the proposition the other man may present to the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment, until I conclude this thought. I call attention to the fact that a great number of these corporations have already obtained permission from a State to build dams. Sometimes they have failed for years to exercise the right, yet they have nevertheless a prior right already established. In such a case the Secretary of War is robbed of all discretion; he must grant the permit to build a dam to that institution that has first acquired the right to build a dam.

The result is that you have by this bill turned over to the present existing institutions having these rights—and in most instances they are great monopolies, or branches of monopolies tied and interlocked together so as to create a great monopoly—for all time substantially every water power there is in this country. You do this by so drawing the bill as to leave no discretion in the Secretary of War. He must give the permit to the corporation which first obtained a right, no matter whether its hands are black with corruption, no matter whether its oppression of the public has been manifested by years of outrage and extortion.

That is the situation you are creating. Now, what says the Senator from West Virginia by his amendment? "In addition to being there first, the applicant must do something else. It must offer better terms than any other applicant." "Ah, but," say the Senators, "how are you going to fix the terms? How are you going to tell which offer is best? How can you frame regulations in advance? How are you going to tell so far ahead which rate is the lowest?"

I can answer these questions in two ways. I can answer them first out of the mouth of experience. There is not a single street-railway corporation, there is not a single electric-light corporation, there is not a single gas corporation in the United States that has the temerity to go to any municipality, to any State, or to any branch of the Government and ask for a franchise without stating its maximum rate. They all do it. They do not dare come in any other guise or in any other manner or form than with a proposition of a maximum rate. If all these corporations, at the hour when their franchise is to be granted, and 50 years in advance of its expiration, can specify maximum prices, if they do this in their contracts with every city, town, village, and municipality in the United States, then grantees under this bill can do the same thing when they come to the Secretary of War asking for a grant by the United States. If they do so come, if they do so bind themselves, that fact does not afterwards deprive the State in which they are located of the right to further lower rates, but it places a maximum limit upon the cupidity, the avarice, and the extortion of the grantee. I think I have answered the question of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

I call attention to an anomaly. Senators say that the Secretary of War is wise enough, that he is prudent enough, that he is intellectual enough, that he is honest enough, so that we can trust to his discretion and to his wisdom such important questions as this: As between "contesting applicants being equally well qualified," he shall do certain things. We put up to him the duty of passing on the question whether they are equally well qualified. That question involves their capitalization; it involves their management; it involves their experience; it involves their financial power. All these difficult questions, Senators say, can be correctly decided by the Secretary of War.

We put up to him a further question. He is to decide which applicant is "best qualified to expedite and realize the maximum useful development of all the water resources of the region." That question involves the highest technical knowledge. It involves the most complete examination. It involves a degree of skill that only an expert, or one who is advised by an expert, can exercise. The Secretary of War, say Senators, can decide so difficult a problem as that. But when they are asked to put into this bill a provision that will give the Secretary the right to decide whether a certain rate offered by one company is lower than a rate offered by another company, immediately, in the opinion of these Senators, the Secretary of War becomes an idiot, incapable of rendering a decision. Such is the logic of Senators as here to-day expressed.

It is monstrous, it is absurd, to say that the Secretary can pass upon the difficult questions I have called attention to, but that he can not determine so simple a question as whether the rate proposed to be charged by A is greater than the rate offered by B. It will be observed that the intelligence of the Secretary is doubted only when it may be so exercised as to give some protection to the people of the United States. The Secretary becomes a dangerous repository of power only when he may employ that power to break the grip of monopoly or to keep the great natural resources of the country from those who may seek to absorb them for personal gain.

If you do not put this provision in the bill as it is written by the Senator from West Virginia, you will simply say to the Secretary of War, "You can only determine which applicant is the best qualified to furnish power for a district and must grant it the permit." This is only another way of saying that the permit must go to the applicant which is the biggest, which comes the nearest being a monopoly, which is the most powerful, which has the most money. You can not give the permit to another, although he comes offering rates twice as advantageous to the public.

I say that in my humble judgment if we do not reconsider this vote, which I believe was not deliberately taken, then we will have said to the people of the United States, "We propose to grant monopoly a grip upon these great water powers that can not be broken for half a century."

So far as I am concerned, I can not vote for a bill that does not have some such provision as is embodied in the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia. I can not give my support to a measure which says to the Secretary of War "You must grant the permit to the biggest corporation." The qualification regarding the giving of the permit avails little, if anything, if for no other reason than if found in the fact that the big corporation is already on the ground and already has secured the right from States or municipalities to build its dam. The language of the bill "that preference shall be given" means that the applicant shall be preferred, to wit, that he shall be given the privilege. You can not otherwise prefer him.

Mr. President, let me appeal to Senators. I have personally had some experience with these matters. Other men in this Chamber have had experience. I claim no superior wisdom, but I have learned in the bitter school of experience that a line properly written into a franchise grant before it has been granted is worth all the regulation you can get thereafter.

It is said how are you going to fix the price? There are a hundred ways to fix the price. One is for the grantee to agree in its franchise that it will not charge more than a certain fixed sum for the power that is to be furnished. That is one way. Another way is to state in the franchise the amount of the capital investment, and to provide that whenever a certain fixed return has been paid then the rate shall be cut to a point that will only give that return, and that the public shall have the benefit of the reduction. I can stand here for an hour and tell you general rules that can be written into franchises that will protect the people, and it will certainly do no harm to put in some of those rules and then reserve the full and complete right on behalf of the State and municipal and governmental authorities to further regulate the rate.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CHILTON. Does not the Senator think it would be most advantageous to add a line in this franchise directed to this point? Here we have been working for days on amendments as to rules under which the Government shall take over the property at the end of 50 years. Does not the Senator think it would be very valuable for the Government to have in this law a provision so that if one contesting company might say when they made the application at the end of the 50 years we will give you the physical property?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not going at this time to enforce the new rule against unauthorized interruptions very strictly because he is applying it to a very considerable extent by the acquiescence of the Senate. The rule is somewhat new in its practical application except in the case of a filibuster, and the Chair does not want to arrogate any right or privilege that the rule itself clearly does not confer upon the Presiding Officer.

The question must be one that does not bolster an argument but asks for information. Any Senator seeking information from the Senator on the floor addressing the Senate has the right to ask him a question, with the permission of the Senator having the floor, that will elicit information about a matter of fact, but he does not have the right, under the pretense of asking a question, to submit an argument in the nominal form of a question. That is one of the noted methods of instruction and disputation. The Socratic system is based upon arguments advanced in the form of asking questions.

Unless otherwise directed by the Senate, the Chair shall, during his occasional and casual discharge of the duties of the chair, enforce the rule that where a Senator asks a question, if well calculated to elicit information about a matter of fact, it will not be a restraint upon the right of a Senator to continue to occupy the floor; but if he permits another Senator to antagonize his position in the argument or to support it by asking a question that is obviously an argument in fact, although couched in the language of a question, the Senator must understand that he does that at the risk of exhausting his further right to occupy the floor, and that after having thus yielded a second time for an argument of that kind he will be deemed to have voluntarily surrendered the floor.

This rule is being enforced by the acquiescence of the Senate, and if any reasonable number of Senators express a desire not to have it enforced, the Chair will permit matters to proceed as they customarily do in normal times in the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. REED. I will endeavor to answer the Senator from West Virginia. Of course, when you come to the question of the most favorable terms under which a plant might be turned over to the Government, you have a very easy question to answer. One man or one corporation might apply for a franchise and not offer to turn it over at the end of the 50-year franchise to the Federal Government at all except under the terms of the bill, which are, in effect, that the Government shall pay the full value of the plant at the end of the 50 years, not of the dam alone, but, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] said the other day, the value of the entire plant that is connected up with the dam—every pole and every wire and every dynamo and every manufactory that is connected up with the dam.

Another applicant might come and say at the end of the period of 50 years, "We will turn the dam over to the Federal Government free of any expense, or we will turn it over upon the payment of the cost of the dam itself." Hundreds of beneficial conditions may be easily concerned. Senators see no difficulty in making a contract, I observe, when the Government is granting away things, when the Government is giving that which it has; but there seems to be very grave doubt about the ablity of the Government to reserve any right for itself or for the benefit of the people. The lions roar in the highway only when the people are moving forward and asking for a modicum of their rights.

Mr. President, I thank you.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, no one has a higher opinion of the ability of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] than I, and no one has greater confidence in his sincerity in any statement or argument that he may make, but I am astonished at the argument the Senator now advances in behalf of this amendment. The arguments he submitted to the Senate the other day in behalf of the amendment offered by himself is directly antagonistic to it. He then said in substance that he could not support this bill if the Secretary of War was to control the business of the developing company.

Provided, however, That before the permit shall be granted under this act the permittee must first obtain, in such manner as may be required by the laws of the States, the consent of the State or States in which the dam or other structure for the development of the water power is proposed to be constructed.

The Senator then wanted no Federal authority over such matters. He wanted it all in the States. Now, according to his argument, he repudiates the State public-utility companies, and wants to vest the power to fix rates in a Federal officer here in Washington, instead of a State public-service commission at his home.

I do not quite see the consistency of these positions.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIELDS. I yield for a question, but not for an argument.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator not see that a condition——

Mr. SHIELDS. I can not yield for an argument. If the Senator desires to ask a question I will do so, so as to conform to the ruling of the President just made upon this subject.

Mr. REED. I am going to try to put it in the form of a question. Does not the Senator see that as a condition precedent a State might grant its permission and after that the Federal Government might exact further conditions in favor of the people without the two authorities being in conflict?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is absolutely impossible to give the States or their public-utility commission jurisdiction over this matter and at the same time vest it in the Secretary of War. The Senator says the Secretary of War may fix the rate to be charged for the power in the permit and the public utility companies may afterwards reduce it. The Senator has forgotten that this bill has a contractual feature, and that whatever contract is made by the Secretary of War must stand and can not be changed by the State authorities. They could not impair the contract made.

If the rates be fixed by agreement with the Secretary of War the public-service commission would not have the power either to raise or reduce them. It would be a contract; it would be final and binding on all the parties. That shows the absolute impracticability of this proposition contained in the amendment, if it is construed as is now insisted upon by the Senator from Missouri.

You can not construe the whole bill by the provisions of one clause or section. You must consider the whole bill. If this amendment has the effect to require the Secretary of War to give preference to a company "which offers in good faith to the United States the most favorable terms for taking over the property at the end of the franchise and the lowest rate for public service" it will destroy several important provisions of the bill.

The power of Congress to enact this bill into a law depends altogether upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. The improvement of navigable rivers is therefore, in a constitutional sense, the primary object of the bill, although no one will furnish the money for such improvement unless he is allowed the power created by the dams constructed. The bill is so framed that the benefits to navigation must always be paramount. This amendment relates to power exclusively. Now, look on page 4, section 2, at this provision:

Second. The project adopted, including the plans, specifications, and location for any dam and accessory work, shall be such as in the judgment of the Secretary of War shall be best adapted to a comprehensive plan for the improvement of the waterway in question for the uses of navigation and for the full development of its water power and for other beneficial public purposes.

If the amendment insisted upon is to be made, that section is abrogated and the navigation takes a second place. The Secretary of War would be required to contract for rates and the value of the property at the end of the permit. Give this amendment the construction here contended for and it nullifies at least one-half of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. President, it was never contemplated that it would have that effect. I do not think as a legal proposition it can have the effect that the Senators insist it will have. But since they have raised that question and insist so earnestly that it would, the amendment ought not to be allowed.

The object of the bill is to secure the development of water power. If we put a proposition in it susceptible of two constructions, or which is ambiguous, or conflict with the important and vital provisions of the bill, we simply open up the floodgates of litigation and the bill will be in such a form that no sensible man will invest the large sums of money required to make water-power developments.

I feel, Mr. President, that in view of the construction now placed upon this proposed amendment it is my duty to the committee and myself to oppose it and vote against it, and I will do so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the amendment but to express the hope that we may have a vote upon this question. We are confronted with this rather singular situation about it. This is the third time the matter has been fully discussed. The amendment was offered yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and it was discussed pro and con.

Mr. NELSON. Did the Senator from West Virginia discuss it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the Senator from West Virginia discussed it, because I heard him. Then to-day the amendment was reserved and was discussed pro and con fully, and we took another vote on it. Now, for the third time, upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected, we are again treated to a discussion which has lasted more than an hour pro and con upon the same question. If the motion of the Senator from Missouri should carry, we would have another discussion and the whole subject would be thrashed over again.

I submit to the Senators who are in charge of the bill and who are anxious to have it passed that they themselves ought at least to exercise a little self-restraint in the matter of debate and let us have a vote.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, just a word in answer to the arguments of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. This amendment which has already been adopted has now been eliminated from the bill, and a motion for reconsideration is pending.

The amendment is objected to upon the ground that it gives the Secretary of War too much discretion. If the Secretary has any discretion left in the bill of any importance it is difficult to find it. The discretion has all been taken from the Secretary of War, and if it is placed anywhere it is placed in the hands of a licensee who is going to get the franchise to build a dam. It does seem to me that at least this amendment should be left in the bill. This is one feature in the bill which seeks to give the public something in return for the privilege.

It is claimed now that it is in competition or antagonistic to the provisions governing the duties of the State commission to regulate rates. In the first place, there are a great many States that have not any commission at all. There are but 12, according to Secretary Lane. So commissions in only 12 States can possibly be in a position where they could claim or anyone could claim for them that this is interfering with their duties. I do not know of any railroad commission or rate commission in any State that prohibits a corporation from doing business for less than the rate that they put down. I do not think the people would long tolerate a commission in any State that forbids the public-service commission from doing business for less than the maximum rate.

There is nothing in this amendment that prohibits, as I understand it, the Secretary of War from letting out a franchise for less than the maximum rate of the railroad commission, if they went above that. It would be repugnant to the provisions giving the regulation of rates to the State commission. All that is left here is for the Secretary of War to get better rates, better conditions, than the State commission.

Now, that is a matter of extreme importance, and it is not at all without precedent in a way. The Secretary of the Interior has now entered an order to lease Indian oil lands upon bonus. An order is entered now in the office of the Secretary of the Interior to let out the Osage Indian lands to the highest bidder and give the privilege to the highest bidder. Here this one small thing, important however in itself, but only concerning one point, is now to be stricken out of the bill, and the bill absolutely stripped of anything that amounts to anything so far, in my judgment at least, as the public interests are concerned.

It does seem to me that the amendment should be permitted to remain in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was nonconcurred in.

Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which he has released for the purpose of this vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. CLAPP (when his name was called). I observe the absence of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], with whom I have a pair, and unless advised as to how he would vote I shall withold my vote for the present.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from North Carolina, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I make the same transfer as announced on the former vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but being informed that, if present, the Senator from Pennsylvania on this proposition would vote as I am about to vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and to say that he is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. COLT. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], but I am at liberty to vote on this amendment, and I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce the following pairs on this vote:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]; and

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Ashurst	Kenyon	Myers	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Kern	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Chilton	La Follette	Norris	Sterling
Hitchcock	Lane	Poindexter	Thompson
Hollis	Lee, Md.	Pomerene	Walsh

Fletcher	Lodge	Smith, Md.	Weeks
Goff	McCumber	Smith, S. C.
Gore	Penrose	Stone

So Mr. REED's motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall there be any further amendment to the bill? Does the Senator from Wisconsin rise for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. HUSTING. No, sir; I rise to make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair will recognize the Senator in a moment. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to make a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will be recognized for that purpose. This is a formal matter.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, while this bill has been debated for several weeks now, it appears from the number of amendments proposed that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction with the bill. In view of the number of amendments which have been killed and still more dissatisfaction with the bill as unamended, it does seem to me—and I say it with great hesitation—that this bill is not such a bill as should be the last word upon this subject by the Senate. It sems to me that if this bill were referred back to the committee and reconsidered a different bill would be presented to the Senate. I have some reason for saying that I know the bill does not meet with the satisfaction of even some of the members of the committee. For that reason I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as upon the former roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and its transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. If present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Being advised that he would vote as I am about to vote on this motion, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were present, he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCCUMBER (after having voted in the negative). I am informed that my pair, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], would vote the same as I have voted on this question, and therefore I have voted; but fearing there may be some mistake about that I will not allow my vote to stand.

Mr. POMERENE. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—19.

Ashurst	Hollis	Lane	Norris
Chamberlain	Husting	Lee, Md.	Poindexter
Chilton	James	Martine, N. J.	Reed

So the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce was rejected

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, having combatted this bill in a number of its features more or less important, I venture to say just a few words at this time in view of the fact that I shall vote for the passage of the bill. I do so, not because it conforms at all with my ideas of what the country may very properly expect from this Congress in the way of water-power legislation, but as an evidence of my intense desire to see some sensible legislation upon this subject, and in the hope and confident expectation that this bill will be modified materially in the other House, so as more clearly to protect the public interest.

Mr. President, I am the more constrained to take this course because now, since the year 1908, for the long time of eight years, no legislation has passed the Congress authorizing the construction of dams in navigable streams. As my information is, the last act of that kind to become effective was the Rainey river bill in the year 1908. It seems to me not less than a crime that for eight long years it has been impossible to carry on the water-power development in this country, that is going forward with such rapid strides in every other country, simply because there is no adequate legislation.

Mr. President, this bill is seriously defective, in my humble opinion, in two essential respects. First, it makes no provision for any adequate return to the Government for the privileges which are granted by it, which are oftentimes of inestimable value; and, second, because in the recapture clause, by which the property may be taken over by the Government at the expiration of the period of the permit—50 years—there is absolutely no power or privilege granted to the people that they would not have if the bill were entirely silent upon that subject.

It is said that we must take the bill in this way in order to secure any development; that we must hold out these inducements to capital in order that it shall engage in the business of power development. I do not think so at all. Time and again we have been told that we must extend these privileges exactly as they are in the bill or there will be no power development. We are told that there was not any under the act of 1910; that no development has gone forward because of the restrictive features of that act and because of the burdens that it imposed upon investors. What is the truth, Mr. President, about the matter? At an early stage of the proceedings I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the year 1912—bear in mind, two years after that act was passed, the act of 1910—an act was passed authorizing the construction of a dam across the Coosa River in the State of Alabama. Another act was debated here at length, and I think received the approbation of the Senate, authorizing the construction of a dam across the Connecticut River. Those two privileges and franchises were applied for by people who were ready to go forward with that development, and if they made the development they were obliged to do it under the provisions of the act of 1910. In other words, capital has been standing here all of these years waiting to go into both of those projects under the provisions of the act of 1910, and subject to all the burdens and the restrictions of that act; but the act of 1910 provided that no development could go on at all, no permit could be granted, unless a special act were passed authorizing the particular improvement, and it was found impossible to get the special act passed by Congress.

The Coosa River bill was vetoed, as you have been told by the distinguished Senator from Alabama. The Connecticut River bill failed in the Congress, and on account of the deadlock that ensued no other applications have been pressed. But in the Fifty-ninth Congress, from 1905 to 1907, 35 special acts authorizing the construction of dams in navigable streams were passed by Congress, and 7 other acts were passed extending the time within which construction might be completed under existing acts. For the last three years—indeed, sir, for the last five years—no one has come here seeking a special act so as to permit operations to go on under the act of 1910, because it was understood that with the division that existed it could not be passed. It is not because of any burdens in that act at all that the development did not go forward.

I am content, however, in the belief that the wisdom of the other branch of Congress, to which, under the Constitution, this bill must go for its approbation, will force the insertion in this bill of provisions that will accord, at least to some degree, with what I believe is the enlightened and the modern sentiment of this country upon this all-important question.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe that it would be better for us to defeat an unjust bill, and rely upon the House sending us a just one, than to send over to the House this bill, which is a very unjust one, with the hope that the House might remedy it?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have thought very seriously about that matter, and I do not mean to say that the consideration which actuates the Senator from Kentucky is not entitled to the greatest weight. It has developed repeatedly that this bill is of immense importance to the northwestern portion of this country, where it will have its greatest application. I do not want to be one to stand any longer in the way of the development of these great resources. If it be true—and I have no doubt it is—that we shall soon have from the House of Representatives a bill upon this subject which conforms much more nearly to my ideas as to what legislation upon this subject should be, I feel sure that the same sentiments will operate to perfect this bill when it goes there. But I submit that it is little less than a crime that the Congress of the United States, for now nearly 10 years, has stood in the way of power development in this country; and we will be participants in that crime unless, during this session of Congress, we dispose of that all-important subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the argument which the Senator from Montana has made is against the bill, although he says he is going to vote for it. Let us, just for a minute, see what this bill is.

We passed in 1906 a law for the purpose of producing water-power development. No water-power development took place. Why? Because the terms of the law were too rigid. In 1910 we passed another act so as to let water-power development be made, but no such development took place, because the terms were too severe. Consequently, up to this time nothing has been done in the way of water-power development; and some of the Senators have been putting on amendments, or trying to put on amendments, in this bill so as to make it in the same way, so that there would be no water-power development under this bill.

This bill provides that before a company does anything it must offer to build works to improve navigation to the extent of millions of dollars, which the Federal Government gets for nothing. Is it possible that is such a great monopoly scheme? Is it possible that companies will put up large amounts of money unless they are permitted at least to recoup the amount which they advance?

It seems to me that when we take into consideration the provisions of this bill, and especially the provision that all rates shall be subject to regulation by the utility commissions of the States, we have as nearly perfect a bill of this kind as we can get; and therefore it seems to me, from those views and from the view that we can get development, that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I feel constrained to vote against this bill, for I am reluctant to oppose any form of internal development; but I feel that this bill, operating as it does only upon a detached portion of the waterway development of the country, will, if passed, serve to put the full development of waterways in a strait-jacket in the future.

I think the fault with our legislation heretofore has been that we have taken hold of only detached portions of the waterway question, instead of treating it fully, broadly, and comprehensively, with a view to developing every beneficial use of water and to mitigating every destructive effect of water. I think the large problem is the one that should be taken first, and logically it includes all these detached portions, and that we should consider the whole first instead of considering the parts first. If we consider the whole problem, we will necessarily include the parts.

I believe that whilst this power is being exercised under the interstate-commerce power of the Constitution, with a view to promoting navigation, action upon detached portions of the waterway question will result in the creation of obstructions to navigation in the construction of costly works, which in time it may be necessary absolutely to obliterate, and we will then pause in such a work of destruction and constructive work in full waterway development for other purposes will be obstructed and delayed.

Mr. President, I am also opposed to this bill, because for years we have been acting upon only detached portions of this subject, although the Democratic Party, now responsible for all legislation, seven years ago indicted the Republican Party in the most vigorous expression for inactivity upon this very question in a platform which unequivocally called for broad and comprehensive treatment of the entire question, the development of rivers from their sources to their mouths, including tributaries and source streams, and specifically including the beneficial uses in addition to the use for navigation for which water can be used, and specifically pointing out the destructive effects which could be averted by scientific development. That declaration was made seven years ago. We lost in that election, and the Republican Party was in power four years without doing anything upon this subject, although its attention was called to it repeatedly, and although there was a report from the former Secretary of War under Mr. Roosevelt's administration—Mr. Taft—indorsing every essential feature of the comprehensive bill which I have been urging so many years, and recommending its adoption by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate.

Three years ago the Democratic Party met in convention again, and not only reiterated the specific pledges of four years before but amplified them. Three years have gone by, and we have had nothing but detached legislation upon this subject—nothing broad and comprehensive, as our platform calls for. We are going into a campaign less than a year hence, and we have now the opportunity of correcting the mistakes we have made in the past and of doing the things which our platform called for and which have been left undone.

This question relates not only to all the watersheds in the country, with their varied activities, but it relates particularly to the development of the great Mississippi Valley, with its numerous tributaries and source streams, embracing nearly two-thirds of the area of the country, which the country is pledged by the platforms of both parties to bring into active harmony and sympathy with the Panama Canal, so that that entire region will be given water transportation down through the Mississippi, through the Panama Canal, to the Pacific coast, and through the Gulf and the Atlantic Ocean to the Atlantic coast. And to-day, as the result of the construction of the Panama Canal and only a partial development of the waterways, we find the great Middle West suffering in competition in its coast markets by reason of the favored competition of the Atlantic coast as the result of unobstructed transportation through the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, as in the past structures have been placed in these streams that have obstructed navigation which have had to be taken out, so in the future you will find the same difficulties; and the trouble will be that a lenient eye will be fixed upon these various water-power developments with a view to cheapening the construction to the promoters of the enterprise; and that inasmuch as the officials in power are not charged as yet by Congress with carrying out a great national policy, they will not be so strict in their requirements of the permittees and grantees of these privileges as to insure an open way for the full development of these rivers for purposes of navigation. The great difficulty with Congress has been that, as I said this morning, it has viewed this entire question through a microscope instead of a telescope. Gimlet eyed, we have been directing ourselves to particular phases of the question, without the breadth of vision that would embrace the entire country and every section of it.

I protest, therefore, against further legislation upon individual phases of this question, upon detached portions of this question, for when the interested parties are secure in what they want, I fear they will obstruct the full legislation for the general good. I call upon the Republican Party to redeem its pledges made under Mr. Roosevelt's administration. I call upon my associates in the Democratic Party to redeem their pledges and to go before the people in the next campaign with one great constructive measure to their credit. Under Republican administrations the great Panama Canal, involving expenditures of nearly $500,000,000, was inaugurated and almost entirely completed. The full development of these waterways for every useful purpose should absorb within the next 10 years at least an equal amount. We are pledged to this great work; and I regard action upon a detached portion as an obstruction to the great policies of the future. I shall therefore vote against this bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say a final word on this bill, and I shall not take more than about three minutes in saying it.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] grows eloquent about depriving the Government of the great benefit and privileges that it is going to get from this bill. This bill is not here for the benefit of the Federal Government. The Federal Government is proposing to grant away a right to private corporations—the right to place obstructions in the navigable streams of the United States. It is not acquiring rights by this bill; it is giving rights away.

It has been said by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that this bill is a bad bill, but that he hopes it will be rectified in the other House of Congress. It seems to me that if the bill is bad it is our business to make it a good bill or to kill it here in our own Chamber.

It has been said on this floor that under laws previously passed the conditions were so hard that no private corporation would undertake the construction of dams, and therefore that we are justified in passing this measure. Mr. President, the existence of one bad law never justifies the passage of another bad law. If the old law was bad and ought to be wiped out, it is not necessary for us to put a bad law in its place. We ought to put a good law in its place.

It has been said that the effect of the restrictive legislation of the past was to stop development. That may be true, and by it some injury may have resulted. But at least the old legislation had this virtue. It retained in the Federal Government and in the people the control of these great water powers, and having the control and ownership, the Government still possessed the right at any time to enact laws that would permit their development.

But once you have granted them away, the power of the Government is gone, and it is admitted at least by some Senators who propose to vote for this bill that in thus granting them away we are not properly guarding the interest of the public.

It may be that conservation went wild in this country, and that many great developments were arrested, but I repeat that it at least had this virtue, it retained to our Government its property and preserved intact its rights. But once we have granted them away, they are gone forever.

I say to the Senators with all solemnity, although I do not think my voice will change a vote, but I shall at least have the satisfaction of recording my protest, that the bill proposes, in effect, to grant perpetual franchises to corporations that will enable them for all time to control the water power of this country. The bill proposes to grant a 50-year franchise. That is a long time. Every man in this Chamber will be dead when that period of time has elapsed; yea, and their immediate successors will also be dead. But that is not the end of the matter. When the 50 years have expired, what happens? The Government of the United States can then enjoy the blessed privilege of taking over and paying the full value of the plant, a thing that it can do at any moment and at any time whenever it is necessary to take the property as a public use. But the bill goes further than that. I repeat what has been said and what I have already said: It undertakes to say that when we do resume the control of one of these properties we can not acquire it by simply paying for the structure that is put in the navigable stream, but we are obliged to buy the entire plant that is connected with it. So in order, under the terms of the bill, to acquire the ownership of a dam put into one of the streams of this country we may be obliged to acquire power plants costing millions of dollars, electric apparatus costing millions of dollars, a network of electric wires that may spread for hundreds of miles in as many directions as there are. All of that is loaded on the Government if it takes possession after the 50 years.

I say there never has been such a grant as that passed in the United States of America in the last 25 years, and there is not a man here who can point to a city, a town, or a village that has granted such a right as that.

It is well enough to say we are going to pass it anyway. It is well enough to say there has been obstruction to special bills. What was the obstruction? We passed the Coosa River bill here in Congress after a long debate. The Coosa River bill was vetoed. Now, instead of being brought forward as a Coosa River bill, we find a bold proposition to pass a bill that will wipe out the control of Congress over all the rivers of the United States to the end, I think, that the Coosa River Dam may be built. I think the power behind this bill is the pent-up energy of the Coosa River Dam project, that remains yet to be built, but that is incubating in the brains and in the councils of some corporation managers.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is the Senator making that charge against the author of the bill?

Mr. REED. I am not making any charge against you, Senator SHIELDS. I could not make that charge, or any other, against you.

Mr. SHIELDS. Nor against anyone connected with the bill, so far as I know.

Mr. REED. I am only saying this, and I am saying it kindly, and I am saying it with that great respect and friendship I have for the Senator who drew this bill. I believe the great potential force that batters and hammers this bill forward is after all that element which exists always and everywhere, which demands that capital shall have whatever capital wants, and that that is a force which exerts itself constantly. I do not mean to say that the Senator from Tennessee is actuated by any motive in the world except his honest judgment in urging this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator from Missouri intend to say that the Senator from Alabama is actuated in any way except from pure motives with reference to this measure?

Mr. REED. No; I have not challenged the Senator from Alabama; but I have looked at the map of the Coosa River Dam which hangs on the wall, and I recall the bitter fight made for the Coosa River Dam bill. I believe that the capitalists of this country have determined, if possible, to get a bill passed that will enable them to build their structures without coming to Congress. That is what I believe; and I think they are asking entirely too much in this bill.

Mr. President, after my amendment which required the State governments to first grant their consent had been put in the bill after an amendment had been put in the bill which provided that when the Secretary of War makes the contracts and enters into the contractural relations, which the bill carefully recites shall be property rights on behalf of the corporation, after the amendment had gone in which provided that the Secretary of War should determine which of several contracts was most in the interest of the people, I felt that we could afford to pass the bill. But the bill as it stands now, with the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia stricken out, simply means this: That whenever an applicant shall come to the Secretary of War and shall show that he is the most powerful of the applicants and he first filed on this claim—I use that term because I think it covers the case—the Secretary of War shall prefer him, although standing beside the great and powerful applicant there shall be a man offering rates twice as good for the public and conditions twice as good for the Government of the United States.

I say the Senate ought not to pass the bill in that shape. So I propose to vote against the bill, because I agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that it is a bad bill, and I do not propose to do what I think is a bad job of work in the hope that somebody else may go over my work and rectify my mistakes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I again ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to utter my protest once more against the passage of this bill, a bill which in my judgment disposes, in effect, of all power and authority at the hands of the Government over the national waters of the United States. It is admittedly defective. Senators who are going to vote for the bill and who have fought for the bill admit that it is defective. But it is claimed that notwithstanding that, on two grounds alone the bill should receive the votes of Senators. The first stated is that the House will take care of it. The second is that crime has been committed because no development has been made for the last 5 or 10 years.

Now, in regard to the House of Representatives taking care of a bill that needs taking care of, anyone who so votes on an important subject like this merely delegates the power of rectifying his mistake to another House, which may or may not rectify that mistake. So far as the Senate is concerned, the vote that is about to be cast on the bill and the rights of the people in the water power of this country may have forever passed out of their hands.

It is said that this is a crime. What is a crime? The fact that for five, six, or seven years there has been no development. We are told that we ought to listen to the cry of capital in distress. If it is a crime to keep the use of this power from men with money for a few years, I wonder how you could characterize an act which takes forever from the people their substantial use of all the property. Which voice should be more potent in settling this question, the voice of men with a little money who want to invest it, or the demand of 100,000,000 people? What is entitled to our first consideration, the larger profits of a few men or the sale of a heritage which is an empire for a mess of pottage? If the bill is passed, you have forever surrendered the people's right to these water powers as effectively as if you asked them to make a quitclaim deed for all these things.

Yet it is said that we should only consider the crime against capital, and which is something far more important, which is something more far-reaching in its effect, more important, more solemn, that we shall not consider the rights of 100,000,000 people in the great water-power system or water-power resources of the country.

I for one want to say that whatever harm may come because of the hindrance of development for a few years the important thing to me is that when the powers shall be developed they shall be developed to some purpose, and that these great powers shall be an instrument for good and not for evil.

Therefore as badly as we want development, we want something still more badly than that, and that is to secure the people in those rights which belong to them; and until such a bill is brought on this floor I shall vote against the bill that does not have it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, a remark made in discussing the bill by the present occupant of the chair, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], when he was not presiding, that efforts were made to introduce amendments here for the purpose of killing the bill constrains me to say that I had no such purpose. Those with whom I consulted concerning my amendment know that my purpose was to so amend the bill that I could look the people of my State in the face again, and, as I think, the people of the United States in the face again, after I had voted for it.

That amendment and others which I thought should have gone into the bill have been defeated by the deliberate judgment and vote of the Senate. Therefore, believing with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that this bill is in some respects criminal, believing with others that it is one-sided, and believing with practically all the Senate that it is defective, I shall certainly vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I will state to the Senator from West Virginia that I did not say it was done for the purpose; I stated that the effect in my judgment would be that; at least that is what I intended to say. No one has a higher regard for the Senator from West Virginia than I.

Mr. CHILTON. I took nothing personal from the Senator's remark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. JAMES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I did before in regard to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). With the consent of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I am paired, I vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Understanding that my pair would vote if present as I do, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. SUTHERLAND's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has been called from the Senate Chamber, and that if he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMPSON (when his name was called). I am paired on this vote with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is in favor of the bill. I am opposed to the bill, and if permitted to vote would vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD] if present would vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Under an agreement with him, I am permitted to vote on this question, notwithstanding his absence. Accordingly I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but being informed that if he were present the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote as I am about to vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CATRON. I am paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I do not know how he would vote if present, but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "yea."

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. If he were present, the Senator from Colorado would vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—46.

So the bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on that motion.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not debatable, is it?

Mr. MYERS. I raise the point of order that it is debatable, and I ask to be heard on the point of order. The motion is debatable, Mr. President, and I have the authority here for that statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the motion is debatable; so the Senator from Montana may proceed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I oppose the motion of the Senator from South Carolina for a number of reasons. In the first place, while it is not binding, of course, nor determinative, I was the first Senator to give notice that I would call up and ask to have considered a bill after the disposition of what was then the unfinished business of the Senate—the Shields water-power bill. We have been on that subject for now more than a month; I think about six weeks. The subject of water power in all its phases has been debated at great length; every phase of the subject has been covered, not only as to navigable streams but as to unnavigable streams, as to streams on privately owned land, and as to streams on public land of the United States Government. If we depart from that now, we shall get away from the subject entirely.

The bill that I think ought to be taken up at this time, and which I gave notice I would ask to have taken up, is House bill No. 408, Calendar No. 49, known as the Ferris power bill. The bill which has just been passed by this body related to the development of water power on navigable streams, while the bill which I gave notice I would ask to have brought up for consideration relates to the development of water power on the public lands of the United States. There are very few navigable rivers in the West. The Shields bill has very little to do with the West; it has nearly all to do with the streams of the South. We all know that nearly all of the power that is going to be developed under the bill which has just been passed, if it becomes a law, will be developed in the Southern States—in the South—whereas the power that will be developed under the bill which I want to call up will be developed nearly altogether in the West.

I want to say to you Senators from the South that I voted to pass your bill; so did my colleague [Mr. WALSH]. You have gotten what you want. Now, are you going to turn down the West and say that the West does not amount to anything? Does not the West amount to anything on the floor of this Senate? Does it not amount to anything in this country? Does it not amount to anything in the Government of this country? Do you not want to develop our resources as well as your own resources? Do you care nothing for the development of a section of this country which, geographically, occupies one-half of its surface and which is a growing section?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator's bill apply to the nonnavigable streams limited to Government land, or does it undertake to control nonnavigable streams without reference to Government-owned lands?

Mr. MYERS. It applies only to streams that run through Government lands, where the development will be on Government lands. You have no Government land in the South and we have in the West very few navigable streams.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that I am asking the question because it has been suggested to me that the bill broadly applies to all nonnavigable streams, and that seems to be utterly impossible, so I wanted to hear from the Senator himself.

Mr. MYERS. That is not the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MYERS. I will yield for a question, but not for a motion to adjourn or to take a recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not intend to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MYERS. I will yield for a question with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator, then, why he singles out the South as the only part of the United States having nonnavigable streams not on public lands? The Senator surely must know that all the nonnavigable streams in New England, in Pennsylvania, in Delaware, in Virginia, in West Virginia, down on the east Atlantic coast, and all the nonnavigable streams in the Middle West—Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and the balance of those States—are equally subject to the criticism that he has made. I want to ask the Senator why insist upon trying to single out the South as an antagonistic force to the Pacific and Rocky Mountain region of the West? We have never taken any position of that sort; we never knew that we occupied it; and when it comes to considering a bill dealing purely with nonnavigable streams which are not on public lands, I wish to say that the South perhaps owns fewer nonnavigable streams not on public lands than the balance of the United States, leaving out the Rocky Mountain States.

Why does the Senator want to raise a sectional issue in connection with this question? God knows, I have not tried to raise any. I have hardly known whether I was in favor of the last bill or not. There is not a single industry, not an interest in the State of Mississippi, so far as I know, that will be affected by the passage of this last bill.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I yielded for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I merely elaborated the question.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will answer the esteemed Senator from Mississippi by saying that I will not make any charge of sectional action if southern Senators will vote down the motion which the Senator from South Carolina has made and will vote to bring my bill on next. Then there will be no ground for such a charge. The Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me; he got my statement twisted around and did not state it as I had stated it. I say that I have heard it claimed, and believe it to be true, that the South is richer in water power than any other section of the United States, and that nearly all of the development—at least, most of the development—under the bill which has just been passed, if it becomes a law, will be in the South. That bill was supported by the southern Senators. Now, we have a water-power bill——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. MYERS. For a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The bill was passed, was it not?

Mr. MYERS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator say that it could have been passed by the votes of the southern Senators?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, no; I do not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator must be aware of the fact that we have not even one-third of this body.

Mr. MYERS. I voted for it myself, and I am not a southerner, except by birth; not by present residence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator surely does not want to raise a northern and southern sectional question concerning a subject into which no sectional question can enter.

Mr. MYERS. The way to obviate it to let the West have legislation to provide for the development of its water power.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Make it an eastern and a western question, if you please, but do not make it a southern question.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to proceed with my remarks and finish undisturbed, if there is any way of doing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor

Mr. MYERS. I believe that a larger part of the development that will be had under the bill which has just been passed, if it becomes a law, will be in the South. We want some water-power development in the West. We have a bill here which will produce it and bring it about. We have passed the bill which will bring about development of water power in the South; and why take a razor or a cheese knife and cut off consideration of the legislation right there and go on with something else? Why not let us have our western water-power developed? Why quit right then and there and proceed to consider armor plate or preparedness or aviation or something else?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator think, after we have been discussing the power bill for five weeks, that the Senate ought to have a change of diet?

Mr. MYERS. No; I think it ought to stay on that same diet until it gives everybody what they want?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MYERS. For a question only.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think this proposition is very much like the old fellow's prayer, who prayed "O God, bless me and my wife and my son and his wife, us four and no more"? While the North and the South and the West are being taken care of, in God's name I want to know what is to become of little New Jersey and great New York and Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. They are going Republican.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, judging from the frequency of the appeals of the Senator from New Jersey to the Almighty, I believe he knows more about prayer perhaps than I do, and therefore I will leave the question for him to answer.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The truth is I am afraid my prayers will not avail us as much as those of Senators from the West.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a question.

Mr. OLIVER. The question I wish to propound to the Senator is this: It is very late this evening and I rather think the debate upon this question may occupy some considerable time. I expect to have something to say upon it at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks, to be addressed to the Senator himself and to our friends on the other side. I ask the Senator now if he will not consent to let this matter go over until to-morrow and yield for a motion for an adjournment or a recess?

Mr. MYERS. I will quit in a couple of minutes, if I am not disturbed any further. I have occupied the floor about 20 minutes, and I have talked only about 2 minutes of the 20, I believe.

We have a bill for the development of water power here, which means a great deal to the Western States. It means more to the West than any other legislation which has been considered or will be considered at this session of Congress. It means the investment of millions of dollars in the West and the creation of billions of dollars' worth of wealth.

I acquiesced in allowing the Senator from Tennessee to call up for consideration first his bill for the development of water power in navigable streams, and I felt implicit confidence at the time I acquiesced in that procedure that, while the Senate was on the subject, the Ferris power bill would follow the Shields bill as a natural, reasonable, logical, fair, and proper thing. Now I see a disposition, having passed that bill, to quit all work on this subject and proceed to something else, and I do not believe that is fair or proper. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from South Carolina on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Vote!

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. Did the Chair recognize me? If so, I desire to make a motion, but I yield to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] to make an announcement.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that immediately after the close of the routine morning business on Friday morning I shall address the Senate in reply to certain phases of the speech made by ex-Senator Root on the 15th of last month.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Regular order!

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD in connection with my remarks the amendment——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order, which is the motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MYERS. I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I renew the motion, so as to get a vote.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I renew the motion to lay on the table, so as to get an immediate vote.

Mr. KERN. I have made a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Chair recognized me. I think I heard the Chair say——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion that the Senator makes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not going to make any motion. I simply wish to say a couple of words in reply to the Senator from Montana——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a motion to adjourn has been made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (continuing). And then I will yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is scarcely justified in saying that the benefits of the bill just passed are in any sense local. They extend all over the United States. I do not desire to go farther upon that subject than the Pacific slope.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. My point of order is that a motion to adjourn has been made, and that nothing is in order but to put that motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No such motion was made.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Indiana made a motion to adjourn, as I understood.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Indiana was not recognized by the Chair. I had already been recognized by the Chair and was on my feet.

Just a word further and I will yield for a motion to adjourn. I wanted to say this to the Senator from Montana: Before the notice was given by him that he desired to call up his power bill I had called attention to the first active matter on the calendar, which is our court bill—our judicial bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (continuing). And I had asked the privilege of bringing it up——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut rises to a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is that the Senator from Pennsylvania made a point of order and that the Chair has not ruled upon it. I ask for a ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling is that no Senator was recognized for the purpose of making a motion to adjourn, and consequently the point of order is overruled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, notice was given by me that I would bring that matter to the attention of the Senate before the Senator from Montana gave his notice. He did not happen to be in the Chamber at the time. I have given it often; and while the Senate is deciding between the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], as to which of these two bills shall be taken up next, I am unwilling that the judicial bill, to which I have called attention, shall be forgotten. Whichever the Senate takes up next, I shall press the judicial bill as the next bill thereafter.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4786) amending the eighth paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, so as to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to appoint assistant inspectors in districts or ports where the exigencies of the service require, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COLT presented petitions adopted at the annual convention of the Rhode Island State Christian Endeavor Union, and of sundry citizens of Newport and Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Lewiston and Auburn, in the State of Maine, remonstrating against reported efforts of Canadian Army officers to secure recruits for the Canadian Army in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial of Cloverleaf Grange, No. 520, Patrons of Husbandry, of Okanogan, Wash., remonstrating against the abolishment of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a petition of the Fraternal Order of Eagles of Centralia, Wash., praying for an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of King County, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to found the Government of the United States on christianity, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of Cloverleaf Grange, No. 520, Patrons of Husbandry, of Okanogan; of Silver Creek Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Silver Creek; and of Happy Hill Grange, No. 513, Patrons of Husbandry, of Conconully, all in the State of Washington, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. 2986) to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. MARTIN of Virginia:

A bill (S. 4855) granting an increase of pension to Michael O'Brien; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE JUDICIAL CODE.

Mr. COLT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1412) further to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

COLORADO COAL STRIKE (H. DOC. NO. 859).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report made to me by Messrs. Seth Low, of New York City; Charles W. Mills, of Philadelphia; and Patrick Gilday, of Clearfield, Pa., in the matter of the labor difficulties in the coal fields of Colorado during the years 1914 and 1915.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 8, 1916.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4786. An act amending the eighth paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, so as to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to appoint assistant inspectors in districts or ports where the exigencies of the service require, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Friday next, the 10th instant, when the opportunity offers, I shall address the Senate upon the issues raised by resolutions introduced in connection with warning Americans against traveling on armed merchant ships of the belligerents.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Wednesday, March 8, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 9, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 8, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, source of all our longings, hopes, and aspirations, we pray that the light of heaven may guide the lawmakers of our land, those who sit in judgment upon their validity, and those who have been chosen to execute the laws; that the coordinate branches of our Government may work together in harmony with Thee; that the life of the Nation and the interests of its people may be conserved and brought to the highest conditions of human perfection; that peace may prevail among us and with all the world, to the good of mankind and to the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MARKETING OF LIVE STOCK AND MEATS (H. DOC. NO. 855.)

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document the conference relating to the marketing of live stock and the distribution of meats, and related matters, conducted by the Department of Agriculture at Chicago, November 15 and 16, 1915.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to have printed as a public document the conference conducted by the Agricultural Department on the marketing of live stock, and so forth. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, when this matter was proposed some days ago I interposed an objection, because of the temporary absence of the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. BARNHART]. I should like to inquire of the gentleman whether he has submitted this proposal to the chairman of the Committee on Printing in the meantime?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I have; and also I have secured a statement from the Public Printer to the effect that it will come within the $500 limit. The cost of printing the usual number of copies will be $447.16.

I will say that while the number to be printed as a public document will not be sufficient, considering the importance of the document, it is the purpose of the agricultural interests concerned in this hearing to order from the Public Printer an additional number of copies. The American Live Stock Association are desirous of ordering a larger number of copies than could be printed under this request for unanimous consent. I have made inquiries at the Department of Agriculture, and have found that they are unable to have it printed, because the number of documents now assigned for printing a little more than exhausted their current appropriation for printing, so it would lie it over for a rather indefinite time. Inasmuch as the number printed by the Government will be comparatively small, and the number printed at private expense will be relatively large, it seems that it is a very important document to have in press at this time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the document that the gentleman is seeking to have printed merely the proceedings of some private association?

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no; it is a conference held under the auspices of the Secretary of Agriculture at Chicago last fall to ascertain the conditions surrounding the marketing of cattle and meat products. At that conference all of the representatives of the live-stock interests and the various associations engaged in live-stock production were heard.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was a hearing under Government supervision?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, indeed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman expect that after this authorization there will be any further expense to the Government besides what is involved in the printing of the usual number?

Mr. BORLAND. I think not. If we get the impress of a public document, I think that will be all that will be necessary. Additional copies will be ordered by private parties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3518) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3144) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On February 26, 1916:

S. 4308. An act to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building for post office and other governmental offices at Sandusky, Ohio, and for other purposes.

On March 1, 1916:

S. 2497. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River between Anoka and Hennepin Counties, in the State of Minnesota.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution which was before the House yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the resolution which was before the House yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that all Members who voted "yea" on any of the propositions yesterday before the House have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that ought to be amended to allow those who voted "nay" to apologize for their recreancy.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary for them to apologize. Their record is made.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the trouble with them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks that all who voted "yea" yesterday—the Chair does not know what he is talking about—shall be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ADAMSON. With the amendment that I suggest——

The SPEAKER. As amended by the request of the gentleman from Georgia, that all who voted "nay" be allowed to extend their remarks——

Mr. ADAMSON. To apologize for their action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent that everybody who voted "yea" yesterday be permitted to extend remarks in the RECORD, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] amends it by adding that all those who voted "nay" be allowed the same privilege. There is no statement of what they were voting about.

Mr. MANN. Would that also exclude those who dodged? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object to it, coming in that form.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the request in a form that I think will be less objectionable to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE]. I ask unanimous consent that Members may be permitted to extend remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the resolutions considered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] asks unanimous consent that Members may be permitted to extend remarks on the resolutions that were debated here yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. For how long?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Any convenient time; 5 or 10 days.

The SPEAKER. For five legislative days. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Does that mean general leave?

The SPEAKER. That means that every Member of the House may print a speech in the RECORD on the resolutions which were considered yesterday within five legislative days. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on the resolutions considered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD on the resolutions considered yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the same request. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHOUSE. I make the same request.

Mr. BENNET. I make the same request.

Mr. SMITH of New York. I make the same request.

Mr. TAGGART. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. SHOUSE, the gentleman from New York, Mr. BENNET, the gentleman from New York, Mr. SMITH, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. TAGGART make the same request——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington objects to these latter requests.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address by the Hon. Martin H. Glynn at the Democratic State convention in New York. I will state that the speech of Senator Root has been printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of ex-Gov. Glynn, chairman of the New York convention. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution which was considered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the resolution of yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I object.

Mr. MILLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution of yesterday. I will state that I have occupied but two minutes of the time of this House this session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the resolution of yesterday. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I object.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS UNDER RECLAMATION ACT.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the bill H. R. 384. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] will take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. KEATING in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 384, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 384) to amend the act of June 23, 1910, entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within the reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has 37 minutes remaining.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a short statement and then I will yield to anyone who wants time on the other side. The act of June 23, 1910, permitted an entryman under reclamation projects after he had made proof before the Commissioner of the General Land Office of residence, improvement, and cultivation, and thereafter under the general reclamation law his homestead was conformed to farm usage, that he might sell the remaining part of the homestead that was not held by him, namely, if it was conformed to 80-acre tract he could sell the other 80 acres. The present bill simply extends the relief to this extent, that where the man under the same reclamation project had made proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation, but before that was done it was conformed to the farm unit, and in many instances without his knowledge, that he might thereafter sell the remaining part of the homestead to an applicant who in turn must comply with the law as to the paying all constructive charges as well as maintenance and upkeep.

The assignee is the real party interested. There are not many remaining cases of this kind. The bill only provides for those in the designated time therein specified, namely, between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1913. The Secretary of the Interior has reported favorably on the bill, and the committee unanimously reported it with two amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. How much territory does this cover?

Mr. RAKER. It will be under the irrigation projects, and there are not many of these claims remaining undisposed of.

Mr. MADDEN. How many?

Mr. RAKER. I would not say definitely; I should say about a dozen. The best information I can get from the department is that there are only a few left. This will give them a chance to adjust the matters and to give to the assignees the value of this land and for which there is no valid adverse interest. In other words, the assignee must be on the land now; there must be no valid adverse claimant interested in the land, and the party believing he had a right to buy all that he did, and believing that the original homesteader had a right to sell it. It gives the assignee the benefit and the right to keep his home.

Mr. MADDEN. This bill is only to quiet the title and adjust the cases where assignments have already been made?

Mr. RAKER. That is all; only those which have already been made.

Mr. MADDEN. It is not to anticipate anything?

Mr. RAKER. No; none whatever. I think we have used all the time, and if there is no objection, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the bill read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one phase in this matter that I have not clearly in mind, and that is the procedure that has followed in cutting down the 160 acres to the smaller unit.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman kindly state his question again?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is one phase of the practical operation of the making of a homestead entry under an irrigation project in having the original 160 acres cut down to 120, 80, or 40 acres. I do not understand the procedure or the reason why the original entry is cut down.

Mr. RAKER. Making a short explanation, I will state that there were many filings made on lands within the reclamation projects before the land was conformed to the farm unit. That is done no more because it has been eliminated. It is all conformed before they are permitted to file. But a man was permitted to file on 160 acres of land within a reclamation project, but he specially provided in the filing application, and stated that when the Government got so far along with the work that it conformed it to farm unit he would relinquish the remainder of his claim over and above what the farm unit was fixed at by the Secretary of the Interior. In other words, when the Secretary fixed the farm unit in that project of 80 acres the man had to yield the remaining 80 acres and he could not get a patent to it.

Now, to obviate that apparent injustice to the man who had made his filing, the act of June 23, 1910, permitted him after he had made proof of five years' residence and five years of cultivation and five years of improvements, that after that five years' final proof the land was conformed to the unit of 80 acres, then he could sell the other 80 acres to any other party, who must in turn comply with the law, pay all charges and reclamation expenses, and then a patent would be issued to the assignee upon his making application to the department accordingly. The conformation was made after he made final proof. In these cases in the present bill where the man made the final proof of five years' residence, cultivation, and improvement, possibly a week or a month before he made the final proof, the department, without knowledge to him or anyone else, conformed it to the farm unit. Therefore his assignee could not get title. The assignee paying full value, after living on the land, was denied the right to obtain patent, and the only purpose of this bill is to grant relief where it was conformed to the farm unit before final proof, although the five-year final proof had been made on it, because the assignee under this bill who acted in good faith is now living on the land, improving it, and paying all assessments to obtain his patent to the remaining 80 acres.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. IGOE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS UNDER THE RECLAMATION ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for an hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the act of June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw certain lands from entry, except for homestead purposes, where, in his opinion, the lands were suitable for irrigation. It also authorized the Secretary of the Interior after such a withdrawal to conform the entries made on the project to a farm unit, which might be 48, 120, or 160 acres. As a result of the passage of that act any man who made an entry within the irrigation project was charged with notice that that entry might be conformed to the farm unit, and to that extent, at least, there is no equity whatever involved in this proposition. The entryman, therefore, had notice that the entry might be reduced and was charged with notice that it might be reduced. People went out on these projects and filed homestead entries. Of course they filed for 160 acres, but they knew and were charged with notice that the acreage of their entry might be reduced.

In some instances the project was not begun and not completed within the time at which it was expected to be begun or completed, and men who had made entry, who had lived on the land for five years, found themselves with a piece of land which was not irrigated and upon which they could not make a living until water was afforded. The act referred to in the report, the act of June 23, 1910, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, 592, authorized these entrymen who had made final proof to assign a part of their entry. I do not think this act ought to have been passed. I do not think there was any equity in the case then which justified the passage of that act. There is, in my opinion, even less justification, less equity, in the passage of the act now before the House. This bill now before the House proposes to accomplish two purposes. It affects or will affect, if passed, two purposes. In the first place, it validates assignments of land upon which filings have been made, and which were in excess of the farm unit. In addition, it proposes to validate assignments which were made prior to the making of final proof. Here is an entryman. He goes on an irrigation project and files on 160 acres. He perhaps lives on it one month. He may live on it for a year or he may live on it for five years. But before he is entitled to make final proof, the Secretary, in the exercise of the discretion and power given him under the terms of the act, conforms that land to a farm unit. The entryman gets exactly what he had a right to expect when he entered upon the land; that is, a piece of land, sufficient for the support of himself and his family, but prior to making final proof, anticipating that the Secretary of the Interior was about to reduce his entry from 160 acres to the farm unit, he has made an assignment to some other person of that part of the land which he knows he can not keep under the conformation order. He never had any title to that part of the land, he had nothing to assign, but he has made an assignment, knowing that he did not have title, and knowing that he had nothing to assign. This act proposes to validate that assignment. I can not see any equity in validating an assignment of that kind.

The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] stated just a few moments ago that the assignee would be obliged to do just exactly what the entryman would have been obliged to do in the first place. I do not think that statement is entirely accurate. He will not be required to live on the land for five years, but simply to do that which he is required to do under the reclamation act; in other words, make the cultivation and the payments required by that act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The point I tried to make was that this bill would apply to those who were on the land, the assignee, that he will be compelled to comply with the reclamation act and pay the upkeep and construction charges and his proportion of the entire cost of the irrigation system.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course that is true, but he has not done what everyone else was required to do—go on the land and live for five years. He gets the benefit of the entry of the man who did actually go and live five years on the land.

Mr. KINKAID. That is correct.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is the situation. He has no equity, he simply bought something which did not exist, and which he knew or ought to have known did not exist. He is a mere speculator, speculating upon the probability that Congress will pass just such an act as is here proposed.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Does the gentleman regard it as fair and just that there should be two homestead compliances in order to secure a patent? When the first entryman lived five years upon the land, why then should another party who buys the right of him live also five years upon the land? Is it not true that five years' residence under the old law and three years' residence now entitles the entryman to a patent, and after he secures his patent then he may transfer it to whomever he shall choose, and the party who buys it may never live upon the land. No other person is required to live five years or three years on the land in order to acquire a patent over again. The patent has been paid for once, and should it be paid for again successively by every man who buys the property? What value is the patent if that be so.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield for a speech. I do not believe that upon a homestead entry on ordinary farm land a man ought to be required to make successive cultivation or successive performance of the requirements of the act.

But that is not the situation here. Here is a man who has filed on land knowing that it might be reduced to a farm unit. He has no right to expect that he is going to get more than the amount of land which is finally fixed as a farm unit. He has no right to expect that he is going to get 160 acres; in fact, he does not expect to get 160 acres. He expects to get a farm unit which on an irrigation project is not ordinarily anything like 160 acres. It is more likely to be 40 or 80 or 120 acres. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] must recognize the fact that the man who gets 40 acres or 80 acres or 120 acres of irrigated land, or land which is susceptible of irrigation, has just as much and oftentimes a great deal more than the man who goes out and files on 160 acres of poor farm land somewhere which is not subject to irrigation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If this bill is not enacted, does the gentleman realize that the excess land would be restored to the public domain and strangers wandering through the country could enter the land, step into the homes of these people who have taken these assignments and have been living there on the assumption that their title would be confirmed?

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, I do not know. I would not have any objection to giving these gentlemen priority of entry upon these farm units; but what I object to is permitting a man to assign to another something which he has not, and then permitting that assignee, by virtue of the assignment, to acquire land under different conditions and with less residence than the man who originally filed on it. That is the thing to which I am objecting.

Now, I want to address myself just for a moment to the terms of the bill itself. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and the other gentlemen who are advocating the passage of this bill may know what it means, but I doubt if anyone else does. It provides that at the end of the act of June 23, 1910, to which I have just referred, there shall be added this proviso:

Provided, That in the absence of any intervening valid adverse interests—

I read the amendment of the committee—

any assignment made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1913, of land upon which the assignor has submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignee purchased in the belief that the assignment was valid—

Now, stop right there. That applies to every assignment, whether made under the reclamation act or not, whether made under the act of June 23, 1910, or not. The word which follows the portion I have just read is the word "and," and that word separates the clause which I have just read from that which follows, and it reads:

And under the act of June 23, 1910.

Now, I do not know whether the gentleman from California intended that result or not, but the effect of the bill in its present form would be to validate every assignment made between those dates upon land upon which the assignor had submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignee purchased with the belief that the assignment was valid, without reference to whether that assignment was made under the act——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Whether the assignment was made under the act of June 23, 1910, or not. If the word "and" was omitted, then it would mean what it seems the gentleman intended it to mean, but with the word "and" in it means exactly what I have said it means. If it is the intention of the gentleman to validate every assignment of land made between those dates under the circumstance stated, without reference to whether they were made under the act of June 23, 1910, or not, the gentleman ought to be frank with the House and say so; but if it is his intention only to validate those assignments which were made in good faith under the act of June 23, 1910, with the belief that they were valid under that act, then he ought to make that statement. The gentleman is not fair to the House if he does not state what he intends by this language. It certainly is not apparent on its face.

Mr. RAKER. There is not any question but that is the purpose and meaning of the act. The gentleman possibly has overlooked—and that is the only difference here in this purported legislation and that of June 23, 1910—that both have made final proof. Under the act of June 23, 1910, the confirmation of the farm unit was made after the final proof and in the present bill where it is conformed to the farm unit they are made before final proof.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it makes any difference whether it was made before or after. I have stated I do not think the act to which the gentleman has referred ought to have been passed at all, and the mere fact it was passed does not justify the passage of this act, because there are even less equities to justify the passage of this act than the other one. There certainly can be very little justification for permitting an assignment of that part of an entry which has been eliminated by conformation and relinquished to the Government prior to the final proof, and in particular where the assignment was made prior to making final proof.

Mr. RAKER. But there is no contention——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAKER. There is no contention of any claims where the assignment was made before final proof, no purpose, and no intent.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not particularly interested in what the gentleman's contentions are; I am interested in what the bill proposes, and there is nothing in the bill which does provide that the assignment shall have been made subsequent to final proof. The assignment under this act would be just as valid before final proof as if it were made after final proof. The bill itself provides that the assignment may be made prior to final proof. It stands on its own feet. All I have to say about it is this, that if it is the intention to make these assignments valid only where they have been made after final proof, gentlemen ought to say so. I do not see how this can be the intention, because the gentleman admits that he is attempting to reach those cases where conformation was made prior to final proof, and if the conformation was made prior to final proof there is no reason why the assignment should not have been made prior to that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and the suggestion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I think have cleared this matter up so that there will be no great difficulty in so amending this bill that it will be satisfactory to everyone. The gentleman from Minnesota has called attention to the fact that the bill as it stands, as he understands it and as he interprets it, seeks to validate assignments made prior to final proof. I think that is a fair construction of the bill, though the bill might be construed otherwise. Now, if we stop and reflect a moment we will discover that an attempt to do that would be an attempt to validate what is, in fact, a fraud. No man can honestly prove up on a piece of land after he has parted title with it. After a homesteader has made an assignment his right, title, and interest are extinguished. He can not make a legal homestead proof covering land previously assigned. And if anything of that sort has been done we certainly should not attempt to validate it.

I think the entire trouble and misunderstanding, if it is a misunderstanding, can be disposed of by striking from the bill—and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]—on page 2, line 16, the words "prior to the date of assignment and." Now, it is just possible that those words were not intended as a validation of assignments made prior to the date of final proof, but they will bear that interpretation in connection with the words that follow.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has called attention to the fact that if we attempted to do that and left the language of the bill otherwise as it stands, that portion of the bill would be without effect, because it is provided in lines 9 and 10 that these assignments shall only be validated in cases where the assignee purchased with the belief that the assignment was valid. Well, the moment that question arose inquiry would be made as to what investigation was made by the purchaser as to the validity of the assignment. The inquiry would be, "Did you read the law?" and, if he said he read the law, it would be discovered that the law stated clearly and specifically that these assignments could not be made until after final proof, and therefore there could be no assignment in good faith. There could be no purchase by an assignee in good faith, assuming he had read the law and informed himself, of a tract which had been assigned prior to final proof. Now, if we strike out the words that I have referred to——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Just what words?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. Lines 16 and 17, the words "prior to the date of assignment and," the act will then provide that assignments will be validated and the rights of the assignee protected, even though prior to the date of final proof the entry had been conformed to farm units and the part assigned canceled and eliminated from the entry. It will be very clear then, beyond a question, that we are not attempting to validate an assignment made prior to the submission of final proof.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I want to say to the gentleman that it is furthest from the committee's mind to make an assignment valid that was made before final proof.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will take the gentleman's word for that and have no doubt but that it is true; but this is also true, and that is evidenced by the report of the department, and I know it is a fact, that in some cases assignments were made prior to the submission of final proof and subsequently final proof was made on the entire tract, including the assigned portion.

Now, I can not understand how any homestead settler could have done that in good faith, how anyone could have purchased such an assignment in good faith, but if we strike out the words I have referred to we simply amend the former statute by providing that certain assignments shall be held valid notwithstanding the fact that at the time of final proof a part of the entry had been eliminated from the tract by some action of the department.

Now, it may be suggested that we should not go even that far. But there are many reasons for doing that. There are cases of which I have knowledge, and all of the gentlemen who live in the vicinity of these reclamation projects know, where entries have been conformed to farm units the work of conformation had gone to the point of the elimination on the records of the Land Office of a portion of the entry without that fact being known to the entryman.

These farm-unit surveys were undertaken from time to time and carried along rather leisurely, and in many cases the settler, while assuming that it would be necessary for him eventually to content himself with less than 160 acres, did not know just what the farm unit would be in his case, and he was not informed by letter in every case before proof of the conformation of his tract. While the settler was charged with notice that his area might be reduced, or was likely to be, he did not have that notice officially up to the time he made final proof in all cases.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not a fact that when these intending entrymen went upon these projects and made their application for 160 acres the Land Office accepted their application and required them to put up the fees for 160 acres, and not until a lapse of over five years, in many instances, did they know but that they would get the 160 acres, and in the meantime went ahead and made improvements upon the land and fenced and cultivated it?

Mr. MONDELL. That is accurate in a way.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is the truth with reference to the Minidoka project in southern Idaho.

Mr. MONDELL. It can not be entirely accurate in any case, because the reclamation law itself charged the entrymen with notice.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is true, but the Government accepted the application, and the entryman naturally assumed he would be able to hold the entry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me an opportunity to finish one sentence, then I will be glad to yield. The reclamation law charged him with notice of the fact that there was to be a conformation to farm units, and in every case that I know of farm-unit surveys were undertaken rather early in the history of the project.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman is not familiar, then, with conditions on the Minidoka project, where entrymen went in and did not get water until six years later. In the meantime they lived on the land and complied with the law as to residence, and they did not know until after water was obtained and made available and conformation was ordered that they would not, in some cases, get the entire 160 acres of land, as their applications had been made at the Land Office for 160 acres and they put up their entire fees for that amount.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true. Many of those people went on the land immediately after the adoption of the reclamation law. In my State some lands had been taken even prior to the passage of the reclamation law. In those cases the men had no knowledge of the reclamation law, but when the reclamation law was passed and they came under it they were charged with notice.

Now, it is an unfortunate fact and a sad fact and a regretable fact that under the early practice of the department some men who had largely improved practically all of their land were compelled to accept patent to only a part of them down to 40 acres. There were some cases of that kind in my State, which worked injustice and hardship, but we can not save or help those men. That is a thing done and completed, and no legislation now would remedy that condition.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MONDELL. But a man, knowing that under the law he had no right to assign until he had made proof, and deliberately doing that, as to such a man I can not understand how he could have done it in good faith.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. McCRACKEN. The gentleman is probably not familiar with the fact that these entrymen went upon those projects under the assumption that they could get 160 acres of land. That had been the custom heretofore, and no one had given them notice that they could do otherwise.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, there are many things that I do not know much about, but I think I am fairly well informed in regard to that particular fact.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I have doubt of it.

Mr. MONDELL. We all know that the general homestead entry has been 160 acres. We all know that the homestead entry under the reclamation law was 160 acres. But we do also know that the reclamation law contained a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reduce the area.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. MONDELL. And while on land subject to the law men were allowed to take 160 acres; they took the 160 acres with the knowledge that they would probably be compelled to accept eventually a patent for a smaller area.

Mr. McCRACKEN. No. I want to disagree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand it is the contention of the gentleman that his people went on irrigation projects without any knowledge of the law? That is a fair question.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Yes. I think most of the entrymen went to the Land Office and offered their applications to enter upon these lands, and those applications were received for 160 acres in nearly every case.

Mr. MONDELL. There is not any question about that. No one contends that that is not true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have 5 or 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. McCRACKEN. But the gentleman says it was just to these entrymen that their entries should be cut down to 80 or 40 acres. I contend that that would not be just to those people, because they went there and made their proof on the basis of 160 acres.

Mr. MONDELL. We are not discussing that, Mr. Chairman, at all. That is foreign to this discussion. As to that provision in the reclamation law allowing entries to be cut down, or authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to conform the lands to farm units, that is not here for discussion at this time. That is not the subject of discussion at all. The gentleman may hold that it was not wise. But that is entirely beside the question.

The question before us now is this: Shall we validate what was—I will not say clearly a fraud, but what it seems to me, had it been done by a man of ordinary intelligence, would seem at least to be a fraud? The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] assures us that the committee has no intent or thought of validating these assignments made prior to the completion of the final proof. That being true, we can easily amend the bill so as to make it clear that we do not intend to do that, by simply striking out the words to which I have referred. But we still leave my friend's constituents who proceeded in good faith under the law in possession of all their rights, and we validate what they did, although it was not in strict conformity of law. The assignment might have been taken in some cases even with official knowledge that part of the entries had been canceled. But whether it was so taken or not, it was taken in a great many cases where the entrymen had put a good deal of time and labor on the entry and improved it, and therefore I think the entrymen should be given the right to assign in the class of cases we treat of.

Now, we are giving them that right, but I think all admit that we should not attempt to validate those cases where assignment was made prior to the submission of final proof. How could any honest, intelligent homesteader go to the land office and swear to final proof of residence on land that he had sold, or on the part of which he had sold? That is a fraud on the face of it, and the gentlemen of the committee tell us that they did not intend to do that.

I think that the bill, amended as I have suggested, will cover all meritorious cases and will validate all of the cases that should be validated. It does relieve quite a considerable number of people who were perfectly honest, I think, in what they did, although what they did did not come within the statute as it was then on the books. I hope the bill will pass with the amendment I have suggested, and at the proper time I shall offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution which was under consideration yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the resolution that was before the House yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I ask the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks the same privilege. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the same request.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that I have the same privilege.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. BAILEY. And I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. And I wish to make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], and that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS], and that of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], and that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAILEY], and that of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois want to use his time now?

Mr. MANN. How does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] 27 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that he may address the House out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I did not have an opportunity to address the House on yesterday; and as I have uniformly made it a practice not to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including any utterances that I have not made on this floor, I am now availing myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and of the House to bring to its attention a matter that I think requires its cognizance. I do not want to indulge in any post mortems, or to reopen the vocal war that we had on yesterday, but it seems to me that this telegram which I hold in my hand, and which most of the gentlemen on this side of the House received, coming from New York, and signed Irish-German Democrats, ought to be exposed. This telegram reads as follows:

NEW YORK, March 6, 1916.

Hon. H. GARLAND DUPRÉ,
Washington, D. C.:

The public almost entirely wants peace. Wilson's proposed secret diplomacy and concealment from Congress means war. We are concerned about Democratic success. Your common sense must save the party, which otherwise will be finally ruined by this partisan administration, so offensive to the vast majority of our voters here.

IRISH-GERMAN DEMOCRATS.

Mr. Chairman, I say I believe that this telegram ought to be exposed. If it is a fake, as I believe it is, it ought to be brought to light; and if it is bona fide, I for one want to express the contempt I feel for the anonymous manner in which the telegram has been sent to this House. I do not know any Irish Democrats, any German Democrats, any English Democrats, or any French Democrats. I only know Democrats, and in a crisis in our country's history I know neither Democrats nor Republicans, but only Americans. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I think no gentleman on this side desires to occupy any more time, except such as I reserve to myself in conclusion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there have been three bills introduced upon this subject, reported favorably, two in the last Congress and one in this Congress, all introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. In the last Congress the gentleman introduced a bill (H. R. 117) on April 7, 1913, which was reported on March 9, 1914. And following the recommendation of the Interior Department at that time the committee reported a substitute bill and provided—

That all entries so assigned shall be subject to the limitations, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto. All of said assignees whose entries are hereby confirmed shall, as a condition to receiving patents, make the proof heretofore required of assignees: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any lands canceled or eliminated from any such entry and which have been embraced in any valid settlement or homestead entry of another.

These provisos are left out of the bill now pending, though there may be a provision which, in a way, answers to them.

In the first bill which was reported it was provided that any assignments made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1914, of all or portions of homestead entries upon which the assignors had submitted satisfactory final proof, and the assignees purchased with the belief that the assignments were valid, are hereby confirmed, and so forth. I do not think it has yet been explained how an assignor, after he has made an assignment, can submit satisfactory final proof of a homestead entry; and the committee and the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] both apparently recognize the value of that criticism, because in the bill H. R. 16099, introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] on April 28, 1914, and reported to the House on May 23, 1914, that language is left out; and where the original bill provided "or prior to submission of final proof" that language is not found in the second bill which the gentleman from California introduced, and which was reported favorably. That is, it occurs in one place in the bill and in another place it is left out. I do not know just what the purpose was.

The Department of the Interior, reporting upon the first bill, recommended a substitute for the bill as introduced. Now they report upon the pending bill, which leaves out about half of the substitute that the department originally recommended. Now the department recommend or do not object to the passage of this bill.

While there has been considerable ado about the matter, and a praiseworthy persistence by our distinguished colleague from California [Mr. RAKER] the department say that there are probably not over half a dozen cases in the United States which would be affected by the bill at all. Whether they are correct about that I do not know. I think, however, if I have any sort of understanding of this bill—and I am willing to confess that when I read the first bill I could get no understanding at all out of it; probably not for lack of clearness in the bill, but for lack of knowledge on my part of the facts under the reclamation law as that law was applied—my understanding of the situation, right or wrong, is that on these reclamation projects many people made homestead claims for 160 acres or for a lesser amount, and that when the time came under the law for the Reclamation Service to determine, as they had the right to, what should be the unit of a homestead entry, they reduced the amount from 160 acres, or a lesser amount perhaps, to 40 acres, and I do not know but in some cases less than 40 acres. When a man made his final proof, if he had made an entry for more than the lesser amount fixed by the Reclamation Service, the additional amount for which he had made entry was excluded from patent at least, and he was not allowed any more than the amount which the Reclamation Service said should be the unit for the homestead entry, which might be 40 acres, or more or less; and that if that occurred, and the man had not parted with his supposed title, he was then permitted to make an assignment; but that in some cases the claimant or homestead entryman had made an assignment of a part of his supposed land covered by his entry, in advance of his final proof; and, as I recall, it is stated that these assignments were in the main made to bankers, probably as collateral security for the purpose of borrowing needed money. Possibly they were not intended to be real assignments, except merely as collateral security. I do not know as to that. The land having been assigned in that way, a man who may have made some improvements upon it, who may have cultivated it, who certainly thought he was going to get it, finds that perhaps the major portion of his homestead claim is taken away from him, without any authority on his part to obtain any recompense whatever or title for his labor.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman let me make a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. If it is not too long.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to suggest that in the West it is very expensive to clear this land, and——

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that is the case; and I have no doubt where they have borrowed money it was for the purpose of putting the money on the land, which in the end the man does not get, although he still owes the money to the bank. The bank may have it as collateral security, but the security is gone. But I would like to inquire, in that connection, how this can do the assignee any good.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I will take five minutes more. "The land upon which the assignor has submitted final proof." How can a homestead entryman submit satisfactory final proof, swearing that he has not disposed of the land, if he has made an assignment of it?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The bill does not cover that kind of land. We have eliminated those who made an assignment before final proof.

Mr. MANN. He can make an assignment after final proof, can he?

Mr. RAKER. He can now under the act of 1910 when the Secretary of the Interior conforms it to the farm unit. The only trouble now is if he conformed it to farm unit before final proof the assignee is out.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression that if he made his final proof then the department made the unit which was less than that covered by final proof that he had the right to make an assignment.

Mr. RAKER. He does under the remedial act of June 23, 1910, but before that act he was helpless. Now, I am going to yield the gentleman more time if I take up too much of his time. A project where land is withdrawn and is for reclamation purposes, and the project may never have been started, the party is permitted to file a homestead, makes final proof, and gets a certificate, but he takes it with the understanding that at any time thereafter the department may conform it to farm unit, and while he might have the whole 160 acres under cultivation, when they did so conform it he will get what they designate, which may be 40 acres, and the other 120 acres can be sold.

Mr. MANN. Let us see how this is.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MANN (reading):

When entries made subject to the provisions of the reclamation act are conformed to the farm units established by this department, in pursuance of said act, prior to the submission by the entryman of proof of residence, cultivation, and improvements required by the ordinary provisions of the homestead law, the areas eliminated from such entries by the conformation thereof to farm units can not be assigned under the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910. The entryman has no interest in the excess land after his entry is conformed to a farm unit, the entry being canceled as to such excess. Where, however, such confirmation to farm units is subsequent to the submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the ordinary provisions of the homestead law, the entries may be conformed to the farm units thus established by assignment of the areas eliminated.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Where the conformation to a farm unit and the cancellation of the surplus is subsequent to the final proof.

Mr. MANN. Where the conformation is subsequent to final proof then he can make his assignment. How could he make an assignment and then afterwards make his final proof on the part which is assigned?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had listened to my discussion of the bill he would have learned that I propose to amend the bill so it would not provide for such an assignment.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's amendment. I am trying to find out from the gentleman from California whether it ought to be amended.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman made the statement that it needs to be amended because, clearly, a man has no right to make a final proof on a tract he has assigned and parted title with.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California seemed to be under the impression that he had; but it is patent that either the language "has submitted satisfactory final proof" ought to stay in or it ought to go out, and if you make a mistake in regard to it it will spoil the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will pardon me, those words should remain in. The words that should go out, in my opinion, are the words preceding "prior to the date of assignment and."

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Referring to the words the gentleman from Illinois has spoken about, the assignor has submitted satisfactory final proof. That means that he has lived on it five years, that he has cultivated it five years, and improved it five years. When he makes final proof of that it has been conformed to the farm unit before he made the final proof, he not realizing it, his testimony would go to show that he had complied with the law and obtained the 160 acres.

Mr. MANN. Can he make proof that he has lived on the land five years and made application for a patent after he has made an assignment of it?

Mr. RAKER. This bill does not cover that case.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a matter of perjury, if he does?

Mr. RAKER. No; because the department in several cases did issue final patent to the assignee as well as the assignor where the final proof was made after assignment, but we do not provide for that in this bill, and I do not think we ought to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I studied over the two bills in the last House, and concluded that I did not know very much about it, and have studied over this bill in this House and did come to the conclusion that I had a fair idea of what it meant, but I throw up my hands—I have not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I do not mean, by what I have said, any reflection upon the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] did not mean to say as I understood in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the assignee in any of these cases made final proof. The only man that has made final proof in any of these cases is the assignor. The assignee will make final proof on his land some time in the future.

Mr. MANN. He said the assignor had made final proof, and that under that the assignee had received a patent, I take it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, there is not any doubt that where the assignee, the original homesteader——

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The original homesteader having 160 acres in his homestead filing, for five years lives upon it, cultivates it, and improves it. He then make final proof, but before he makes that final proof the Secretary of the Interior conforms the land to the farm unit, he not appreciating that fact. Then, after he has made his final proof, he sells it to a bona fide purchaser, or sells 80 acres over and above that to which he is entitled. This bill permits the assignee—and the assignee alone, because the original homesteader, the assignor, gets his patent beyond question—to continue to comply with the law under the provisions and restrictions of the act of June 23, 1910, to obtain a patent for that which he believed he had a right to obtain a patent when he purchased it, although the act of June 23, 1910, permits the assignment if the conformation to the farm unit is made, after the final proof. This bill simply says that perchance the conformation was made before the final proof and the parties both being in good faith, the assignee having paid value for what he obtains, he shall not be deprived of a patent.

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand from the gentleman that an assignor or homestead entryman may not have known that there had been a conformation to the farm unit?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And he makes his application for patent?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And then ascertains, after he has made his application in good faith, that there has been a conformation to farm units which cuts down the amount that can be given to him?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. And that then he made an assignment?

Mr. RAKER. He could do that; but I do not say that was so in these particular cases. Evidently, from the information that I can gather, it was after he has made his final proof, and, of course, the information would soon leak out in a community.

Mr. MANN. The act of 1910 clearly authorized him to make the assignment of the excess?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the conformation itself is made after the final proof is submitted?

Mr. RAKER. That he can do now under the law.

Mr. MANN. Under the act of 1910?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So he must have made his final proof or thought he was making it under this bill before he knew there had been a conformation?

Mr. RAKER. That is all there is to it; yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know. I hope the gentleman will take the time to go over the bill in detail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, in order that I may print an article upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am requested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRITT] to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks upon the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the same request on behalf of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] makes the same request. Is there objection to the requests of any of these gentlemen to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the McLemore resolution. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, in response to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I believe, while I did not intend to take any more time and, possibly, ought not to do so, that it might be better to take a few minutes of the time of the House to go over in as short a way as I can just to explain the purpose of the bill. Having before me the act of June 23, 1910, which I will read in a minute, it is recognizable as a fact that when a man obtained a filing upon his land or claim of 160 acres, after final proof and final receipt issued, in equity, or, as the courts repeatedly held, he had an inchoate title, which the Government did not attempt to take from him; but when the reclamation act was passed it contained a provision that the man made the filing subject to the right of the Government to reduce the area of his homestead, which was 160 acres, to any number of acres that, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, would be sufficient to support a man and his family. That was in his filing of the application. A good many of them never realized what it meant. The land was thrown open for settlement and filing without any restrictions, except what the law provided. Then when it came to conform to the farm unit he for the first time realized that what he thought he had was 160 acres of land turned out to be, in some instances, 20 acres. The other 120 acres was beyond his control, although improved, fenced, cultivated. In some instances it was conformed to an 80-acre tract, and he found 80 acres of his fenced, cultivated, and improved land, worth a great deal of money, absolutely beyond his control or handling; and for land upon which he had given five, six, or eight years of the best years of his life he could get no return for all of this work.

To relieve that situation to the end that the man who had actually made an improvement and had done the work, Congress, in its wisdom, said that this homesteader, although legally not being permitted to patent this land, he having made the application for it and signed a written statement that he would accept only what the Secretary of the Interior said he should have; notwithstanding this man all these years—and it must have been at least five years—we will permit him to sell out and get some of the proceeds of his labor, and that the assignee, having purchased it from this original homesteader, could then obtain a patent for the land connecting the original five years of the original homesteader with his five years' improvement and his five years' cultivation upon two conditions:

First, the payment of the annual assessment for upkeep and maintenance of the project; and, second, the payment of the proportion of the construction charges. He would then get a patent, provided that the conformation to the farm unit was made after the final proof. Now, this bill finds a number of people who had lived on the land five years, who had cultivated it five years, improved it for five years, and made final proof or submitted satisfactory proof, which is what we contend for in the bill and in the act means the same thing, and is intended to mean the same thing. He has made his final proof, and after he has made that final proof and assigned a part of the entry according to the conformation to the farm unit it turns out that the conformation order was made before he made his final proof. Now, it simply puts these few men, between the 23d of June, 1910, and the 1st of January, 1913, in the same category, relieving the honest, bona fide assignee, who has paid his money, who has been on the land, and against which there is no valid claim—simply recognizes that equity that is brought about by all these expenses and all this work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has five minutes remaining.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from California inform me why the two provisos that were in the bill in the last House have been left out of the bill in this House, and whether the gentleman thinks the proviso that is in the bill in this House is their equivalent?

Mr. RAKER. The proviso here intends, as I view it and as I think it does, to date back to the act of June 23, 1910, and makes him comply with all the conditions of that act.

Mr. MANN. Was this bill prepared by the department?

Mr. RAKER. The substitute was. I sent it up and introduced the substitute.

Mr. MANN. That was in the last Congress, but this is quite different from that.

Mr. RAKER. I will tell the gentleman how that occurred. The gentleman knows that it was brought up several times in an effort to get unanimous consent and there were suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois and some other gentleman, and I tried to conform this bill to the views then expressed so as to avoid any possible complication. I then introduced it and sent it to the Interior Department.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Department of the Interior considers this last proviso in this bill as an equivalent of the two provisos which were in the former bill which they recommended?

Mr. RAKER. The only answer I can give to the gentleman is that it was submitted to them and they made a report on it, and it was intended, as I view it, to cover the same subject. May I call the gentleman's attention to the act of June 23, 1910, which reads as follows:

Provided, That all assignments made under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the limitations, charges, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act.

Now, that proviso in this bill that is under consideration is intended to incorporate all those provisions in this act to the end that the assignee must in every particular, except as provided in this bill, comply with the reclamation act and all acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. MANN. Well, there was a second proviso in the last Congress.

Mr. RAKER. Which bill is that; is that the last bill?

Mr. MANN. Well, it is in both of them:

That this act shall not apply to any land canceled and eliminated from any such entry and which has been embraced in any valid settlement or homestead entered by another.

Mr. RAKER. It is intended to be covered by the amendment in lines 5 and 6, page 2, which reads:

In the absence of any intervening, valid, adverse interests.

That covers that proviso. I did not quite get the gentleman's question when he put it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I still have a little curiosity, and I would like to ask my friend what has become of Mrs. Lucy Comoll?

Mr. RAKER. Well, she is hanging in the air; she is holding her claim there.

Mr. MANN. Has not she starved to death?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I think not.

Mr. MANN. Is she still in possession?

Mr. RAKER. That is my understanding. I will not say it positively.

Mr. MANN. Her husband is still worthless, incompetent, and a burden?

Mr. RAKER. Of that I am not advised at the present time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not want to make that statement, then, as the principal argument in favor of this bill?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. That seemed to be the main contention in the last Congress.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman will notice that this report does not contain that.

Mr. MANN. I have noticed that. That is the reason my curiosity caused me to ask the gentleman the question.

I do not desire to consume the balance of my time.

Mr. RAKER. I do not desire to consume the balance of mine, either.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 384) to amend the act of June 23, 1910, entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within the reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act."

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 23, 1910 (Public, 243, 36 Stat., p. 592), entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act," is hereby amended by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That any assignment made between June 23, 1910, and January 1, 1913, of which the assignor has submitted satisfactory final proof and the assignee purchased with the belief that the assignment was valid and under the act of June 23, 1910, are hereby confirmed, and the assignee shall be entitled to the land assigned as under the act of June 23, 1910, notwithstanding that said original entry was conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from said entry prior to the date of assignment and prior to the date of final proof: Provided further, That such assignee shall in all other respects comply with all of the provisions of the act of June 23, 1910."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "that," insert the words "in the absence of any intervening valid adverse interest."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman just what that means? Suppose somebody had made a claim on this property for the purpose of ousting the assignee?

Mr. RAKER. My understanding of the meaning of this language is that if anyone has gone to the land office and made a filing—tendered a filing for this land—it would be an adverse claim.

Mr. MANN. Why can not the assignee make a homestead entry? Have they not the right in nearly every case?

Mr. RAKER. It may be that the assignee is not qualified to make the homestead entry.

Mr. MANN. You put the case of Mrs. Comoll. She can make a homestead entry, can she not?

Mr. RAKER. She might not.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. RAKER. She might not have the qualifications.

Mr. MANN. A woman who is supporting her husband can not make a homestead claim?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so. A woman who is unfortunate enough to have a husband who is a scalawag at leisure does not get the benefit of the homestead act.

Mr. MANN. I did not put it that way. I thought the gentleman was going to say a woman who was unfortunate enough to have a husband.

Mr. RAKER. No, sir. I think they are both fortunate.

Mr. MANN. Or a man who is fortunate enough to have a wife.

Mr. RAKER. That is good. I agree with that always.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "of" insert the words "land upon."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 16 and 17, after the word "entry," in line 16, strike out the words "prior to the date of assignment and."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me there is only one valid objection to this legislation, and that is that the presence of the words which I propose to strike out in the bill may lead to the interpretation by the Land Office of an intent on the part of Congress to validate assignments made prior to the submission of final proof. I am not certain that the language is fairly susceptible of that sort of interpretation; but, if it is not, it is clearly superfluous, for with this language stricken out the law will provide that assignments may be made subsequent to final proof. That is the original law; and then this proviso following, that an assignment made during a certain period, made in accordance with that law, but made in cases where prior to the assignment there had been an elimination by cancellation of a part of the entry, the assignment would still be valid. I propose to strike out, in lines 16 and 17, the words "prior to the date of assignment and." The proviso will then simply provide for the confirmation of assignments made after final proof in accordance with law, but assignments that are not valid now because at the time of the assignment the land had already been conformed to the farm unit by the department and part of it had been canceled. It would cover such cases, of course, where this had all occurred before the submission of final proof.

Mr. RAKER. Really as it reads here, to construe the words "prior to the date of assignment and prior to the date of final proof"——

Mr. MONDELL. There is no comma there, and that is one phrase.

Mr. RAKER. I think it means the same thing, and I do not see any objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. On what subject?

Mr. GARDNER. On some matters of preparedness and a communication from the Navy League—nothing offensive.

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of preparedness and the Navy League, and nothing that is offensive. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, would it be proper to inquire what the gentleman's definition of "offensive" is? It is rather of a new form in which to submit a request.

Mr. MANN. It is very certain that the gentleman's remarks will not be offensive to anyone.

Mr. GARDNER. I merely made that remark because sometimes there are controversial matters between the Navy League and a Member of this House that I prefer to read in the RECORD rather than print in the RECORD. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's request was acceded to?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The request was granted.

Mr. MANN. The language here is, "notwithstanding the original entry was conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from said entry prior to the date of assignment and prior to the date of final proof." Now, the gentleman proposes to strike out "prior to the date of assignment" upon the ground, as I understood him, that it might let in assignments which were made prior to the final proof and prior to the conformation. On first blush it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman would accomplish directly the reverse of what he seeks to accomplish. He would make the language read, "conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from the said entry prior to the date of final proof."

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; that is true. But if this language is stricken out it would not include claims where there had been an assignment prior to final proof; and that is the class of claims we desire to eliminate.

Mr. MANN. Why not? What is there to show that all assignments made prior to the date of final proof would not be eliminated? That is, if the farm units were conformed prior to the final proof?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman understands that this is a proviso to a former law.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but this law supersedes the other law, so far as it has any effect.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand; but so far as we do not specifically modify the other law, the other law governs. Now, by striking out the words "prior to the assignment and" there is nothing in this proviso or in the original law that would allow the assignment to be made prior to the submission of the final proof, because the original law provides, and would remain in force, that assignment could not be made until after final proof.

Mr. MANN. This language does not relate to final proof. This language relates to the date of conformation of farm units.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read that language carefully he will see that the words "prior to the date of final assignment and prior to final proof," as they stand in the bill, without a comma between them, are one common proposition, and that standing in the bill as they do, they would validate cases where conformation of farm units was not only prior to the date of final proof, but the assignment was prior to the date of final proof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the inserting or leaving out of a comma has no effect whatever in making a distinction in language. In the early days, when I was a boy in college, they used to stick in a comma wherever they could; but modern proof readers leave them out now wherever they can, leaving the reader, and properly, to construe. This language relates to the date of conformation, and as it is in the bill, it requires that the conformation must have been prior to the assignment, and also prior to the date of final proof.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; subsequent to the date of final proof. That is the original law.

Mr. MANN. We are not talking about the original law. We are talking about this. It says, "Nothwithstanding that said original entry was conformed to farm units and that the part assigned was canceled and eliminated from said entry," and that is the part of conformation practically prior to the date of final assignment and prior to the date of final proof. That relates to the date of conformation of farm units, and under this bill it requires that conformation must have been made before the date of assignment, and also before the date of final proof.

Mr. MONDELL. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman from Illinois is, to let in this class of cases. There are probably not more than half a dozen of them. But I would prefer to keep them out. But if the gentleman from Illinois objects to having this class of cases stricken out, I have no particular interest in the matter. If he thinks we ought to let in these fraudulent cases, well and good.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have profound respect for the gentleman from Wyoming, profound respect for his knowledge upon all subjects, and especially respect for his knowledge upon public-land questions. Yet it seems to me the language that he strikes out lets in a lot of cases instead of excluding them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee amendment that was adopted at the beginning of the proviso, in my opinion, should be amended. I did not notice the amendment at the time. I understand it can only be amended by unanimous consent, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] to this fact, that the language used is, "in the absence of any intervening valid adverse interest." The word "interest" in that connection is an entirely new word, so far as I know, in public-land legislation. The word used universally is "right."

Mr. KINKAID. Or "claim."

Mr. MONDELL. I am not sure just what class of pretended rights or pretended interests might be brought in under this language. What we seek to do is to preserve an intervening adverse right. That is the term that has been used from the beginning of time in connection with our land legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will ask if the word used is not "claim"?

Mr. MONDELL. No; not generally, though it is sometimes. We do not set aside one man's claim for another man's claim, but we set aside one man's claim for another man's right; and the word generally used is "right."

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The word used here is "valid." That would apply to a claim.

Mr. MONDELL. What is an "interest"? He might have a mortgage on it. I think, in any event, we should modify that language. I say we should use the word "right," because all we are intending to recognize is a right. The gentleman suggests the word "claim." That is a little broader. That is not the term ordinarily used in such cases, but even that would be better than the word "interest."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. RAKER. This protects a man where he ought to be protected.

Mr. MONDELL. The trouble is it does not protect the very men whom the gentleman is trying to protect in his bill.

Mr. RAKER. Why not?

Mr. MONDELL. Because it makes their rights subsequent and junior to the interest that some one may assert.

Mr. RAKER. It is pretty hard for anyone to get an adverse interest, because it is an interest in the land. The amendment is suggested by the department, and I think that if a man has actually purchased a claim and is occupying it and using it, it is not intended to let a third party go in there and try to put him out.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, as I understand it, the gentleman does not really want to relieve the people whom his bill seeks to relieve if there is any shadow of an interest asserted by anyone contrary to their claims.

Mr. RAKER. Just the reverse. The words "adverse interest" must mean an adverse interest in the land, and therefore it would be mighty hard for an interloper to get in there and beat the assignee out of his valid claim, and the purpose is to protect him.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the idea, after all these years, in using a word in such a connection as this, which, so far as I can recall, has never been used in this sense in our land legislation.

Mr. RAKER. As I take it, it would really protect the assignee as he ought to be protected.

Mr. MONDELL. But this is not protecting the assignee. It is directly against the interest of the assignee, as the gentleman will see if he will read the language.

Mr. RAKER. I have read it.

Mr. MONDELL. It says that—

In the absence of any intervening valid adverse interest.

Now there is a barrier put up before you do anything for these people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Before the gentleman proceeds to do anything for these assignees he places a barrier against them, and says that they may be relieved and their claims validated in the absence of any intervening valid adverse interest. Now, nobody knows——

Mr. RAKER. Let me ask the gentleman, what does this valid adverse interest mean?

Mr. MONDELL. Nobody knows, as far as I am informed, what it would be held to mean; because, so far as I can recall, it is a new word in connection with the guarding of an intervening right. No one knows what the department would hold it to mean, but we know what the department would hold was intended if we used the word "right." We know fairly well what they would hold if we used the word "claim."

Mr. RAKER. Yes; but when you use the word "interest," taking it in its legal meaning, the adverse party himself must have some interest in the land.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to my friend from California, as I said to the gentleman from Illinois, that having started out to relieve some folks and to validate their claims or rights, if he wants to insert language in his bill that places a barrier against those rights, why, I have no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I think this relieves them.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent—the gentleman may deny it—to amend by striking out the word "interest," in line 6, and inserting the word "right."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the word "interest," in line 6, be stricken out and the word "right" inserted. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think we want that. I object.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the language the gentleman wants, if he wants to protect these people.

Mr. RAKER. No; "interests" is what we want.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California objects.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend by striking out the word "are" in line 11, page 2, and inserting the word "is."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 11, at the end of the line, strike out the word "are" and insert the word "is."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has endeavored to get our genial friend [Mr. RAKER] to agree to an amendment which he thinks might seriously affect the merits of the bill and what it would accomplish. The gentleman from California has objected. But I am sure the gentleman from California will be quite willing that when the House refers to a single thing it shall use the singular verb instead of the plural.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman's amendment is very appropriate indeed, and the only one that ought to be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "interest," in line 6, page 2, and insert the word "right."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 6, strike out the word "interest" and insert the word "right."

Mr. RAKER. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. We have disposed of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I agree that Congress should not invade the prerogatives of the President with regard to international matters. A few days ago, when the President claimed this prerogative, Congress, with the exception of a few Members, showed no disposition to interfere with the President's negotiations. Thus the matter rested, and would have rested for all time.

Suddenly the President demanded from Congress an expression of opinion. He thereby abdicated his right to decide the question and placed the responsibility upon us. In effect it was a referendum to the people on the question of warning.

We were not asked to table or dismiss the issue. We were not asked to say that diplomatic questions do not belong to Congress. We were asked to face the issue squarely upon the merits and say whether it is right or proper to warn.

In this situation I feel impelled to express my honest conviction in favor of warning American citizens from embarking on armed merchant ships.

The graver the issue the more imperative becomes our duty to be fair, considerate, and candid. We can be firm without being imperious. Without loss of honor or prestige Lincoln tempered Seward's haughty message to England and avoided war.

A warning to Americans to keep off armed ships would not undermine the President in his diplomatic controversy. Warning means danger, and the danger is the possibility of war. There could be no war except for the President's avowed determination to maintain the right of Americans to travel on armed ships. Warning therefore implies strict adherence to his contention.

If we do not court war, why should we not reduce this real danger to a minimum by warning? Is it wrong or imprudent or unpatriotic to warn? No. It does not deprive any citizen of his right or deny protection if that right be violated. It merely requests him not to put to sure and certain proof the determination to protect him. It merely cautions him not to involve his country in war by his voluntary act. We do not warn him for his own safety, but for the safety and welfare of his country. We warn him against the possibility of war involved in the President's determination to hold Germany to strict accountability for his death. We say by warning that the President means business in his contention that international law should be upheld, but that we are a peace-loving people, determined by every fair and considerate means to avoid unnecessary acts on the part of our citizens that may lead to conflict. The President himself would have performed a patriotic act if in this situation he had seen fit to issue warning, as he did in the Mexican situation.

Mr. HOPWOOD. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. ELSTON. I will.

Mr. HOPWOOD. In view of the fact that there is a rumor this morning that the President has changed his mind and has decided to issue a warning, does the gentleman know whether there is any truth in that?

Mr. ELSTON. I have no information on that matter, but I hope it is true. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the President during his negotiations with Germany on the question of armed merchant ships might well have coupled with them a declaration of warning to American citizens. The country would have applauded such an act of consideration, and no construction of weakness could have been placed upon it. It was then his duty to warn. Whether or not he performs that belated duty now, he can derive little satisfaction from the inconclusive vote that took place yesterday, which did not meet fairly and squarely the issue as to warning, upon which issue he stated that he wished a full and fair discussion and a conclusive vote on the merits. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I asked the privilege yesterday to be heard just to read some questions. I now ask unanimous consent that I may read them now and to further extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. How long will it take?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. About two minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed out of order for two minutes, and the gentleman from New York couples with it the request that he may be allowed to proceed for two minutes out of order.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, out of courtesy to the House I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD without reading anything at present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his request as he first made it, and asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object generally, but so many gentlemen have asked permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD this morning and have had objections made to the requests that I think it is unfair to grant the favor in one case and not in another, and therefore I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a minute?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "the," in line 19, page 2, insert the words "act of June 17, 1902, and."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, at the request of several Members, I desire to withdraw my objection to the request made by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DAVIS]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. Why is that necessary, and what is the effect of it?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman will notice that the provisions with which the assignee must comply, or ought to comply, are in the act of June 17, 1902, and not in the act of June 23, 1910. That act contains no provision whatever with which an assignee must comply. While this part of the bill is in the nature of a proviso to the act of June 23, 1910, as a matter of fact, it is an entirely different act and applies to the assignments made under entirely different conditions.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the original language submitted by the department was the correct language, referring to the original reclamation act and all acts amendatory thereto, and I think if the gentleman's amendment goes in it should include the acts amendatory thereof. But it leads me to make a remark about the form of amendments to laws. Here is a law of 1910, and it is proposed to amend that law by adding the following proviso, and then at the end of the proviso it says, "It shall be subject to the act of June 23, 1910," which is the act that is being amended. Of course, an amendment to an act becomes a part of the original act, and when it is finally printed, if it shall be, in the supplement to the statutes it would be printed as one act. You will have the act of June 23, 1910, which says in language that it shall be subject to itself. It is an incorrect method of expression. No amendment to an act ought to say by reference to the act itself that it is subject to that act. It is an amendment of the act, and the correct language is in the bill reported in the last Congress, suggested by the department, making it all subject to the reclamation act and of acts amendatory thereof. We now say, "Here is John Jones," and then we say, "This is John Jones."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out, after the word "the," in line 19, and inserting "act of June 17, 1902, and all acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman modifying his amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "the," line 19, page 2, strike out the words "act of June 17, 1902," and insert the words "all acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KEATING, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 384) for the relief of homesteaders under the reclamation act and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from California withhold his motion for the previous question?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. MANN. If the Anderson amendment goes in, it seems to me that it ought to go in in the language that the gentleman had in the former bill, which is quite complete.

Mr. RAKER. That is quite satisfactory. It intended to do the same thing that the gentleman wants accomplished.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, which I think is desirable, was prepared more hastily than that of the department, and I have the language of the former bill, if the gentleman is satisfied with it.

Mr. RAKER. It is satisfactory to me.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment which was adopted in the committee and which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "further," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following: "That all entries so assigned shall be subject to the limitations, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and all of said assignees whose entries are hereby confirmed shall, as a condition to receiving the patent, make the proof required heretofore of assignees."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to accept that as an amendment, and on that I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, after the word "further," insert the following language: "That all entries so assigned shall be subject to the limitations, terms, and conditions of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and all of said assignees whose entries are hereby confirmed shall, as a condition to receiving patent, make the proof required heretofore of assignees."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LABOR DIFFICULTIES IN COLORADO (H. DOC. NO. 859).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress a report made to me by Messrs. Seth Low, of New York City; Charles W. Mills, of Philadelphia; and Patrick Gilday, of Clearfield, Pa., in the matter of the labor difficulties in the coal fields of Colorado during the years 1914 and 1915.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 8, 1916.

The SPEAKER. The message will be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and, without objection, the message and documents will be printed.

There was no objection.

BOISE & ARROWROCK RAILROAD.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11156) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be appraised and to sell the Boise & Arrowrock Railroad, and for other purposes, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the bill H. R. 11156. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11156, with Mr. DAVENPORT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior the Boise & Arrowrock Railroad, constructed by the Reclamation Service under the provisions of the act of Congress of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), for use in connection with the construction of the Arrowrock Dam, Boise project, is no longer needed for said construction purpose, the said Secretary of the Interior may cause said railroad, together with the right of way on which the same is located, and such part of the equipment and appurtenances used in connection therewith as he shall deem most profitable or economical to sell in connection with said railroad, to be appraised by three disinterested persons, to be appointed by him, and thereafter to sell the same for not less than the appraised value, at public auction, to the highest bidder, after giving public notice of the time and place of sale by posting upon the premises and by publication once a week for not less than four weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the railroad, the proceeds of such sale to be covered into the reclamation fund and credited to the Boise project, and such credit applied upon the features of said project against which the cost of the construction of said railroad was charged: Provided, That said Secretary may reject any or all bids: Provided further, That after said railroad has once been offered for sale at public auction and not sold the Secretary may, in his discretion, sell said railroad, together with the equipment and appurtenances aforesaid, at private sale on such terms and conditions and at such price as he may deem to be to the best interest of the Government. Any sale hereunder shall be subject to the terms and conditions of two certain agreements, one dated March 2, 1911, between the United States and the Barber Lumber Co., and the other dated November 18, 1915, between the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. and the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell the Boise & Arrowrock Railroad. This is a railroad 17 miles in length, with 1 mile of siding, which was constructed by the Reclamation Service for the purpose of hauling material to the site of the Arrowrock Dam, in the State of Idaho. The dam is now constructed, and the Government has no further use for the railroad. The Secretary of the Interior undertook to lease the railroad and advertised for bids, but received no bids, and now he reports that he believes it to be to the best interest of the Government to authorize the sale of it, subject to two contracts that the Government entered into in regard to it; one with the Barber Lumber Co., from which the Government obtained certain rights of way and easements out to this dam site, and providing for certain rights on the part of the lumber company to the use of the road, and the other contract was with the Oregon Short Line Railroad, defining their connecting rights, and so forth. As I say, this railroad has served the purpose for which it was constructed, and this bill is simply asking Congress for the authority to sell it. The bill provides, first, that the property shall be appraised by three disinterested persons to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, and then advertisement of the sale shall be made, and if no bidders are obtained for the amount of the appraisement, then the Secretary is authorized to sell at private sale.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice from reading the agreement with the Barber Lumber Co. that their rights of operation over this railroad can never be terminated so long as the Government operates it or any of its assignees.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think that is correct; that is my recollection of the reading of the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. In view of that superior claim of the Barber Lumber Co. to operate its trains ad libitum——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Oh, no; they operate subject to the regulations of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Subject to the regulations of the Government so long as the Government is operating the road, but not subject to the control of the assignees when once the Government surrenders the control, other than the charge that may be levied upon them for the use of the road.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman will examine article 6 of the agreement, he will find that in the event of sale the lumber company shall be entitled to operate trains upon and over said road only for the carriage of logs, lumber, and other freight and employees, incidental to and required by the logging and lumbering operations of the company. Whatever the Government sells the party buying will take; in other words, the purchaser will acquire whatever rights the Government has.

Mr. STAFFORD. But this right of the Government is subject to this superior right of the Barber Lumber Co.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would say that the lumber-company right is not superior in any respect to the right of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly the lumber company will always have the right under this agreement to operate its trains, whether the Government owns it or the assignee operates it.

The point to which I wish to direct my inquiry is whether the gentleman can inform the committee as to the extent of the rolling stock of this Government line?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The Government rolling stock?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I can not state to the gentleman definitely the amount of the rolling stock, but it was just such an amount as the Government needed for hauling material out to this dam.

Mr. STAFFORD. It appearing that there is no one who is willing to lease it, and as it is but a spur track of railroad running from Boise City on a spur line of the Oregon Short Line Railroad, 17 miles, to nowhere, to a dam site, it would be most difficult to find any bidder at public sale to take a property which would be subject to the operating claims of a lumber company; therefore I thought it would be better to vest the authority in the Secretary of the Interior at the start, to negotiate a sale privately, rather than put it up at public auction, with no bidder likely to be found, and which would delay the sale.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think it is well enough to clothe the Secretary with power to advertise for bidders. I do not think there is anything to be lost by that, but it is a question as to whether or not this property can be sold at its appraised value, and I will state also to the gentleman that in this opinion the Secretary of the Interior agrees with me.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield in that particular?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. As a general proposition I would assent to the proposal that it is better to submit a property to public sale, but when we take into consideration the fact that this railroad is virtually subject to the claims of a lumber company to operate its trains over this right of way for all time and that there has been no applicant to lease this railroad, would it not be more economical and safe to negotiate for a private sale? When once the Oregon Short Line, which I believe might acquire this, knows that there is no one in the market who wishes to lease or to purchase, why, naturally, the Secretary of the Interior will be obliged to shave off the price and take any price he can get in order to get rid of something that the Government has no use for and does not want.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman permit me to make a short statement?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The Arrowrock Dam is the highest dam in the United States. At the time of its opening last August over 12,000 people visited there during a period of about one week, and I desire to say for the information of the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is quite possible that a very good price can be secured for this railroad in order that they may run daily excursions up to this great dam, and I do not see the force in the gentleman's argument in asking that a private sale be effected instead of a public sale, as is generally done in the sale of public property.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that no one wants to lease it because of these superior claims of the lumber company whose rights you can not supplant.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman for a question; I desire to be entirely courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to encroach upon the gentleman's time; I thought I was proceeding with the consent of the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not suppose the gentleman would object to having an appraisement made of this property before offering it for sale. I think that is one of the important things.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will, and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. I do not object; I never object to any request made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the gentleman from Illinois—he is uniformly kind to me—and to say, as the gentleman from Texas has so kindly yielded, I will not take much time of the House.

Mr. Chairman, we have reached a crisis in the European war when we are in real danger of participating in the war. The same President who has kept us out of the war up to the present time stands at the helm and guides our ship. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States shall be my guide and compass in this perilous period of our country. When our forefathers wrote the Constitution the President was charged in that Constitution with the exclusive management of all war questions until negotiations reach the point of a declaration of war. Should the question of a declaration of war be reached, then the responsibility of a Member of Congress begins, and not until then. The President has the confidential correspondence relating to all war questions. He can not give it to the world. He has not given it to Congress on the impending crisis. On him alone rests the responsibility for properly directing the settlement of controversies pertaining to war. He is called upon to construe treaties of nations, and he is called upon to construe international law as to rights of Americans at sea. The question is, shall I support the President or shall I be a party officially to hampering and embarrassing him in his efforts to keep this country out of war. Congress has no constitutional authority to take action on these questions now an issue and pending between our country and belligerent nations. The Constitution places these questions exclusively in the hands of the President. Grave international complications exist and negotiations are in progress. The Constitution directs the President to settle these questions, and Congress has no constitutional authority for intruding upon the prerogative of the President.

Members of Congress have no constitutional authority to hamper the President's diplomatic negotiation on war questions, and the fact that they refuse to handicap him on his war policy does not mean that they are subservient to his will, as some persons have been unkind enough to charge, in this hour of our country's peril. Many Republicans and nearly all of the Democrats are refusing to hamper his efforts to keep us out of war, but that does not mean that they will support all his views on questions pertaining to general and local legislation. Civilized governments have solemnly contracted with each other to maintain specific international laws.

The President informs us that his firm demand for American rights by international law leads to peace—honorable and self-respecting peace. Should the question of war come before Congress, all the facts leading up to the issue to be voted upon by Congress will be placed before us as Members of Congress, and then I shall assume the full responsibility of voting for or against a declaration of war. Until that time is reached, I feel that Congress should not hamper our constitutional leader. The Constitution charges me with the power of exercising my official right to vote for or against war. Congress alone can declare war.

Mr. Speaker, those in the counsel of the President give us to understand that if Congress hampers and embarrasses the President such actions might bring on war instantly, and they give us to understand that if we do not embarrass him he will continue to steer us out of war. I can conceive of nothing so horrible as war; but, Mr. Speaker, there have ever been in the history of nations times when self-respecting governments must assert their rights, and to fail to do so leads to war and tends to the destruction of liberties. We do not belong to the warring class, but we are a brave and fearless people. I am for peace, honorable peace, and all reasonable methods should be exhausted to the very limit before this country should have a breach with any nation.

I do not believe American citizens should travel on any kind of ships owned by belligerent nations. Furthermore, I desire to say I do not believe this country will become involved in war solely on account of the foolhardy recklessness of Americans taking passage on vessels belonging to warring nations. I have been schooled to abhor war and to spare no effort to avert its horrors. Around the hearthstone in a humble country home in my childhood days I heard the story of the awful death struggle between the States from my parents, who lived through that period. From my soldier father I heard the story of the suffering and death in the trenches, and I am against war for my country and my people.

Mr. Speaker, when this European war sprung like a monster of lightning speed from a clear sky upon the entire world, at a time when there were no war clouds visible, I pledged my heart to lend my help to the utmost, in my official capacity, to avert that dreadful calamity for my people. At the present time we behold the world engaged in war, with the exception of part of the American Continent, such as man never conceived. There have been killed in this war nearly twice as many men as were enlisted in both Union and Confederate armies at any period during the War between the States.

We witness a war upon land, under the land, upon sea, under the sea, and in the air. Beneath the waters of the mighty ocean the submarine steals upon the unsuspecting victim, discharges its torpedo, and leaves thousands of helpless men, women, children, and babes floating and screaming for help to no avail. Above the earth, 5 miles in the air, the aircraft drop bombs of destruction upon the peaceful and unoffending inhabitants of the earth. Giant guns belch forth shells, reaching 12 and 14 miles, destroying cities, ships, and fortifications considered impregnable. I refer to no particular nation; they all use these death-dealing weapons; but we do not want to expose our boys, our fathers, and our country to these horrors.

The horrors of this war surpass all ancient or modern civilized or savage warfare. May the Lord, in His mercy, give us a continuation of peace and make this great Nation in America the instrument of leading the warring nations to an early and permanent peace. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman yielded, I understand, to me to answer the question he propounded to me a few minutes ago?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that my remarks could not be construed to hold that I was opposed to an appraisal. I merely submit that it would be better for the interests of the Government to delegate to the Secretary the authority at the outset to make a sale privately rather than to advertise publicly, and, perhaps, not receive any bids whatsoever, and then authorize it.

Now, as the gentleman was about to yield the floor, I did wish to ask one question further about the bill. I direct his attention to line 3 on page 2, in which the Secretary is deputed to sell such part of the equipment and appurtenances as he shall deem most profitable or economical. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what he considers "most profitable or economical."

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that that provision is put in to give the Secretary some discretion as to what part of the equipment and appurtenances he will sell and what he shall retain for the use of the Government at other places if he desires to so use it. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior as to what he considers profitable and economical.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit? As I read the bill, I thought it was more of a limitation and restriction upon the Secretary's discretion rather than an amplification of his powers. I think it would have been better to substitute the word "proper" rather than the restrictive terms "more profitable or economical," so as to give the Secretary the widest range.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his opinion about that matter, because I think the Secretary ought to be given some discretion to see what equipment ought to be sold and which would be most profitable or economical.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think you are requiring him, if the gentleman will permit, to pass judgment as to whether what he decides to sell will be most profitable or economical, whereas as a business proposition he might say it would be well to get rid of the whole railroad and all its properties at once, and make a bulk sale without any restrictions at all.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think he could do that under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand this Arrowrock Dam is an irrigation dam.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. It is.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is there a settlement there now?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. There is.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of people on the project?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The Government has charge of the Arrowrock Dam, and there are very few people there now, because of their being but small opportunity to cultivate land there. Only those connected with the management of the dam are living there.

Mr. ANDERSON. How many people are there now?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Probably not over three or four families.

Mr. ANDERSON. How large a tract is it expected this dam will irrigate?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. About 250,000 acres are now under irrigation from this dam.

Mr. ANDERSON. And it is expected there will be constant increase of settlement in this area?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government is operating this railroad at present?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Up to the time of the completion of the dam, two or three months ago.

Mr. ANDERSON. How do the people get in and out of there now?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. By driving up the canyon from Barberton, which is about 8 miles from Boise.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would it not be desirable to operate this railroad so that people can get in and out and take their effects in there and out?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I should say not. The amount of business would be so small it would not pay the wages of one brakeman.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, if there is no profit in it, you are not going to be able to sell it to anybody.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is profit in carrying the people in and out on excursions—people coming from the city and wanting to see the dam.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand the gentleman to take the position that it is cheaper for people to haul their effects in by team than to haul them over this railroad?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It would be if they had to pay the expense of running a railroad to carry up the little bit of provisions they use.

Mr. ANDERSON. That may be true; but certainly that is not going to continue to be the case.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no probability of increasing the population at the Arrowrock Dam.

Mr. MADDEN. May I ask the gentleman who will buy the railroad?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That remains to be seen. We want to get a chance to advertise and give people the chance to buy it.

Mr. MADDEN. How much did the railroad cost?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not know. The report shows that, I presume.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The report does not show that.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is 18 miles long.

Mr. ANDERSON. Has the gentleman investigated the feasibility of tearing up this railroad and using the material in Alaska or somewhere else, where the Government is carrying on constructive projects?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The committee did not go into that question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, it seems to me the committee ought to have gone into that question.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Besides, it belongs to the reclamation fund, as I understand it, and the Secretary, without legislation, would perhaps not have the authority to make the transfer for another purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is, if I recall, a suggestion in the bill, and the gentleman himself just made a suggestion, that it might be advisable to use some part of this equipment on some other projects.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. An irrigation project is what I meant.

Mr. ANDERSON. What probability is there that that might be done?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not know the opinion of the Government at this time. The Government will certainly undertake new projects after a while when those which it is now building are completed, and it is impossible for me to say, when these new projects have not been selected, where the Government may need this equipment.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I understand the situation, here is a railroad which is of no value now to the Government. I say no value, but I mean the Government has no use for it now.

It also appears that there is no use for it on the part of the public except such use as might arise from the transportation of a few tourists who might want to go and look at the dam. Now, I can not see what possible chance there is to sell that railroad, as a railroad, under the circumstances. It might be possible to sell the stuff there for junk or to be used in some other place or use it at some other place, but I can not see any possible chance of selling it as a railroad.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If that is true, would it not be possible to take it up and move it? While the committee has no evidence to that effect, it occurs to me that possibly a sale might be made to this lumber company.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wanted to know what the idea of the committee was. The House is entitled to know what the committee thinks and what the department had in mind with respect to this sale.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The committee was of opinion that this sale ought to be authorized; that the Government ought to sell whatever rights it has there for whatever it could get.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do.

Mr. BENNET. If it is a fair question, are the Members from Idaho in favor of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I believe there is only one who is present. He can speak for himself.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is another gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. McCRACKEN. We are certainly in favor of it. I want to say, for the information of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], that this road is only 17 miles long, and it has served its purpose. It would be only proper to give the Secretary of the Interior the right to sell that railroad to the best bidder that he can find. It is possible that the Short Line Railroad might buy it, or it is possible that the Barber Lumber Co. might buy it. I hope that Boise City might be induced to buy and operate it, using it to convey tourists to see this great dam. So far as I am concerned, I am going to urge the citizens of my city to buy the railroad for that purpose.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it is apparent, if the railroad is continued in its present location, that it ought to be operated by some corporation operating as a common carrier. It ought not to be operated as a mere logging railroad. It ought to be operated as a public common carrier.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. I would like to have two minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Nebraska two minutes.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Irrigation of Arid Lands, which reported this bill, I desire to say that the committee gave it very careful consideration, and reached the conclusion that it was a good business proposition to carry out the request made by the Secretary of the Interior.

Now, the Secretary of the Interior wrote a letter to the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH], asking him to introduce the bill. He wished to dispose of this railroad, for which the Government has no longer any use whatever, and it is an expense to carry it. The Government has no use for it, and the Government had better dispose of it and realize whatever it can.

According to the statements of the gentleman from Idaho, there may be several bidders, and it would be better to offer the property for sale at public auction, after advertisement has been made, than it would to undertake to sell it at private sale. We all know that imputations might be made, or suspicions might arise, if private sale were had. We know what accusations might be made against the Secretary of the Interior. He might be accused of not having made the most out of the property, or he might possibly be accused of not having tried to realize the most from the property, so that we owe it to the Government and to the Secretary of the Interior to provide the means whereby he may make it appear to the public that he is disposed to realize the last dollar possible for the property, and certainly by advertising more bidders are likely to be found than by not advertising.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Did Congress ever authorize the Secretary of the Interior to enter into any contract with a private corporation to give them part ownership of a railroad that was constructed by the Government of the United States out of the reclamation fund? That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] will allow me——

Mr. KINKAID. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that the general reclamation act authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to construct these projects, and there seems to be no question but that the Secretary is authorized to adopt such general means as he shall find necessary to carry out this power. Otherwise he could not carry out his instructions successfully. That is the construction that the Secretary of the Interior probably gives, as I think, to the general law, and that is the law under which he is acting.

Mr. MADDEN. The general reclamation act gives the Secretary of the Interior the power to construct the reclamation projects——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. But it does not give him any power to enter into any contract by means of which any private individual becomes part owner in that project, except in so far as the public-land feature of it is concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. What I was going to say to the gentleman is that this company is not a joint owner, but this lumber company grants the right of way, and in consideration of that the Government gives the company certain rights, subordinate to those of the Government, to use the railroad.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the lumber company own the land over which the railroad was built?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. A part of it, and part of it the company had leased.

Mr. MADDEN. Was it not all public land over which the railroad was built?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Was it not all public land upon which the dam was built?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I am sure it is.

Mr. MADDEN. May it not be possible that some time in the future this dam may break and have to be reconstructed? And if that should be the case, can not you gentlemen see the possibility of having to build a new railroad; or, if not to build a new railroad, to pay this private individual who may own the railroad, by the Government giving its interest to him, high freight rates in order to be able to transport the material to rebuild the dam?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think the contingency to which the gentleman refers is so remote that we would not be justified in retaining a railroad for which the Government has no further use.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the floor in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand the reason why the committee brings in a report without first having the information as to the amount of money expended by the Government of the United States in the construction of this railroad and then showing in detail what interest the Barber Lumber Co. has in the railroad, how it acquired that interest, whether the railroad company is capitalized, what percentage of the stock is owned by private individuals and what percentage by the Government, what quantity of material has been hauled over the railroad during its existence, what is the population in the territory served by the railroad, what is the prospect of future development which might make the railroad a paying venture, and whether or not there is any danger of this project, on which the Government has spent such a vast amount of money, needing the use of the railroad later on to carry material for its reconstruction. All these things are important and vital, and they ought to be answered definitely and lucidly to the Congress of the United States before any action is taken upon this bill.

Mr. McCRACKEN. For the information of the gentleman, I want to say that there is no danger that the Government will ever be required to reconstruct that dam or any portion of it.

Mr. MADDEN. When the gentleman makes that statement on what does he base his information?

Mr. McCRACKEN. Because it has been stated by the best engineers in the country that that dam will never need any reconstruction.

Mr. MADDEN. But such things have happened, that dams more potential than this one have broken away.

Mr. McCRACKEN. But this is the greatest dam in the world.

Mr. MADDEN. That may be true, but the greatest things in the world have been destroyed. Recently on the other side of the ocean we have had great battles, great armies assembled the like of which were never heard of before.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman how long he would retain this railroad while waiting for this dam to break?

Mr. MADDEN. I would retain it as long as I believed there was any opportunity for its use.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The Secretary of the Interior states that it is no longer needed by the Government in connection with that dam.

Mr. MADDEN. If it was concluded to be wise to sell the railroad, it seems to me that before we authorize the sale we ought to have information upon which to base a clear judgment; that we ought not to decide to sell a piece of property into which the Government of the United States has dumped a large amount of money without first knowing how much money has been put into it, and how much money is to be taken out of it, and the use to which it is to be put; and we ought to have the further information, in my judgment, as to just exactly how the Barber Lumber Co. came to be interested in this road, and what right anybody had to make a contract with the Barber Lumber Co. to give them an interest in the road and whether the contract was a legal contract.

Mr. SLOAN and Mr. BENNET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MADDEN. I do; and I will yield to the gentleman from New York later.

Mr. BENNET. I should like to have about 15 minutes of the gentleman's time.

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield to the gentleman later.

Mr. SLOAN. I recognize that the gentleman is looking after the interests of the Government, and that he ought to be termed the watchdog of the deficit. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would rather begin to watch before we have a deficit.

Mr. SLOAN. Speaking of this dam, that may or may not go out, is this one of the continental dams that we read about? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. It is within the confines of the continent.

Mr. SLOAN. And the gentleman does not care that much about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Not exactly.

Mr. SLOAN. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman another question, because this is a subject that we out West are very much interested in. Is the fact that the terminus of this road is not in the metropolis of the State of Illinois the real basis for the gentleman's criticism and objection to the disposing of the road?

Mr. MANN. All railroads lead to Chicago.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; they railroad almost everything there.

Mr. MADDEN. On the contrary, I want to say to the gentleman from Nebraska, who is always lucid in every question that he proposes to any Member of the House, that if there is any place in the world where we ought to have a railroad controlled and operated by the Government of the United States, it is at the point where we have a great artificial waterway, in order that we may be able to carry the excursionists who will travel from the arid territory in the valleys of the West to a place where they will enjoy the luxurious climate tempered by the waters of the great lake created by the Government of the United States at tremendous expense, and the facilities to reach which are now asked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] and the other gentlemen of this great committee to be given away.

Mr. SLOAN. Is this road a means of sanitation or one of commerce?

Mr. MADDEN. I would believe that the commerce of the road could be expedited so that you might reach a point where sanitation would be assured. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there are three considerations in connection with the bill that are being neglected by the large attendance here to-day. I realize that after such a strenuous day as we had yesterday there is a natural reaction in the minds of the large number of Members present here, and that their minds are not on this question.

The three questions I have in mind are these: First, the disposition of the proceeds of the sale of this alleged railroad; second, the injury that has been done to the Government rights in this road by the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. What connection has this matter with the Post Office appropriation bill?

Mr. BENNET. I will come to that later; and the third is an incidental remark made by the gentleman from Texas, or possibly it was the gentleman from Nebraska—I am not interested in the personality of who made it—that this bill ought to pass because the Secretary of the Interior recommended it.

I propose to address myself to these three points with some little reference to the habit there is in legislative bodies of falling into loose ways in the passing of bills, and the necessity for scrutinizing bills which even seem to be as unimportant as this bill in reference to a railroad.

The first point is as to the disposition of the proceeds. Of course we Members from the East are not so familiar as gentlemen from the West with this mass of legislation as to reclamation and irrigation and all those things, but once in a while we are called upon to concentrate our attention and vote on some matter in connection with it. When I make that statement I am not referring to this bill particularly, because it is comparatively unimportant. I recall that in the Sixty-first Congress this Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands reported to this House a recommendation which was subsequently concurred in by another committee and by the House, under which we authorized an issue of bonds to the extent, if my memory serves me, of $30,000,000.

Mr. KINKAID. Twenty million dollars.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Nebraska says $20,000,000, and he is accurate, as he always is. The bonds were issued. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The bill provided for an advance of $20,000,000 from the general fund, and the issuance of certificates should be made, if necessary, to get the money, and while the money has been used, my information is that none of the certificates have yet been issued.

Mr. BENNET. But the gentleman has no doubt that they will be issued and will have to be redeemed. As I read the bill—I may be in error about it, and if I am I should like to be corrected—as I read this bill, the proceeds instead of being segregated as against these bonds, as I think any banker would agree would be a proper thing to do, we cover them into the General Treasury.

Now, I will ask the gentleman from Texas, why is it that when on the very first opportunity when we are getting money back out of the reclamation project there is not a provision that the proceeds shall be subject to this $20,000,000 of bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I think I can explain that. The cost of the railroad is charged up as the cost of this particular project, and the entire cost of the project when the land is taken under the project by the water users will be charged up to them, and they will have to pay it back. They will have to pay the cost of the railroad back to the Government, and therefore it is nothing more than fair and just and right and equitable that whatever is gotten out of the sale of the railroad shall be paid back to the reclamation fund, and that it shall come out of that fund and be credited to the water users. In other words, credited as a payment upon the entire cost of the construction of this particular project.

Mr. BENNET. Yes; but, as I understand it, these $20,000,000 of bonds were authorized in the Sixty-first Congress, as against an expected deficit arising out of the failure of men to pay, out of the realization of less for the land than was expected, out of the fact that the cost was more than had been anticipated. All these elements were to be taken care of by the $20,000,000 bonds. Why is it not right and fair that this particular project, when the money comes in from the sale of the lands—what you might call an unearned increment—why is it that it should not be paid into the same fund, to hold against the $20,000,000 issue of bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The act which the gentleman mentions provided that, at the end of five years from the time the first money is advanced to the reclamation fund, that 50 per cent of the proceeds of the reclamation fund should be paid on this indebtedness, the proceeds coming from all sources—from the sale of public lands and from the payment of construction charges.

Mr. BENNET. Then it was a provision somewhat in the nature of a sinking fund to take care of the $20,000,000 of bonds?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. That would seem to explain that portion of the bill. Now I come to the third point, and that is that this railroad is going to be sold on joint account. We can distinctly assume that there are two owners to this property—the Barber Co. and the Government. We are not informed by the Secretary of the Interior or by any other source as to the percentage of ownership of the railroad between the Barber Co. and the Government.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman say "the Government?"

Mr. BENNET. Because some gentleman said that the Government had contributed a portion of the expense toward the cost of the railroad, and therefore I presume the Government was part owner.

Mr. MANN. The Government owns the railroad now. It is the absolute owner of it, with a contract with Barber & Co. and another contract with the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co.; but the Government is the owner of the road. Not only that, but whoever buys the road buys it subject to the two contracts which the Government now has in respect to it.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] may be right, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID] may be right, they are both good men.

Mr. KINKAID. Oh, the gentleman from Illinois is right.

Mr. BENNET. Now, I know the gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is absolutely correct about this matter. The Government is the sole owner of this property. The Government built it, but in acquiring the right of way and easements and connections with the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. it had to enter into certain contracts, and if the gentleman from New York had read the report——

Mr. BENNET. It is in such fine print that it is hard to read it all.

Mr. SMITH of Texas He will find that the two contracts are set out in full.

Mr. BENNET. I see that.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Defining exactly the interests and rights that were granted to those companies by the Government in making the arrangements to build and operate the road. The Government is the owner.

Mr. BENNET. I see that on pages 2, 3, 4, and 5 the two contracts appear, but it is pretty hard to call on a man in the rush of business, especially on a day like this, to stop and construe two abstruse contracts; but in any event that makes no difference with the point to which I was just about to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. He was one of the distinguished authors of the Post Office appropriation bill, and I want to say to him what I did not have a chance to say in the debate upon that bill, that he and I both being interested in cities very largely, that bill is the best bill for cities that has passed this House in 10 years. There is one provision, however, in the bill that has a direct bearing, if it becomes a law, on the sale of this railroad. Here is a short-line railroad, and I understand that there are about 900 short-line railroads in the United States. It is put up for sale. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has called attention to the fact that there are already two conditions that must be complied with—that is, these two contracts which may be beneficial, may be injurious; I do not know—but I do know that if the Post Office appropriation bill passes the Senate, and is signed by the President in the form in which it passed the House, the man why buys that railroad buys either a lawsuit with the United States Government or faces the probability of losing a great deal of money.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BENNET. Yes.
Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the gentleman contends that if he refuses to comply with the request of the United States Government to carry the mails, he would be likely to be fined $5,000 or be sent to the penitentiary.
Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I contend a little bit more than that, but the gentleman has started on the right line. I had not stated what provision of the bill it was that affected the railroad, but the gentleman has put his finger upon it.
Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know what was in the bill. [Laughter.]
Mr. BENNET. And so do I; and the gentleman and I both came to the same conclusion as to the effect it would have on the railroad. I thought the gentleman would tell me what the provision was.
Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York is very adroit, and he always elicits information without asking the question direct. It is his sweet smile that brings it out.
Mr. BENNET. The gentleman and I have nothing on each other in regard to sweet smiles.
Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York as yet has not elicited the conclusions he has reached. He is just getting ready to think about it.
Mr. BENNET. Oh, I have thought about it; and I am getting ready to have the House think about it.
Mr. MADDEN. I am glad that all the Members are here so that they will understand what the gentleman is going to tell about it.
Mr. BENNET. All the Members of the House that are likely to vote on this bill are here. Here is the point. Suppose gentlemen go out from all over the United States, as is one of the purposes of this bill, and bid on this 17-mile railroad, and the Post Office bill becomes a law. Any man who bids knows that he has either got to carry the mail—that is, he knows it, if the law is constitutional—at any price that the Postmaster General fixes, because that is what the bill says, or pay $5,000 fine for the refusal.
Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the Postmaster General would have the right to fix the price at less than that fixed in the law?
Mr. BENNET. I do, because the gentleman reminded me of the law as we were passing, that the rates in the bill were permissive, and that the bill provides—and the gentleman and I both know that is so—that the Postmaster General shall not pay more than a certain amount.
Mr. MADDEN. But the bill also provides that the Postmaster General shall have the right to pay in excess of the rates fixed in the law where the conditions justify it, and that, of course, is intended to apply to just such railroads as this.
Mr. BENNET. But of course it comes right back to my contention, that the man who buys that railroad knows that he will either have to carry the mail at the price fixed by the Postmaster General or pay a fine of $5,000, and I am not sure, under the wording of the bill—and I do not want to be dogmatic about it—but that the Postmaster General could say to that man every day, "You must carry the mail at such a price," and upon his refusal to carry the mail at that price he would have to pay a $5,000 fine for each day that he refused.
Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. BENNET. Certainly.
Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend, in the face of the statement made by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH], that there were only four people at that place, that any Postmaster General would be so arbitrary as to require the railroad to carry the mails?
Mr. BENNET. Well, I am going to cover that in my third point; this practice we have fallen into in this House of passing bills because some Cabinet officer sends a letter and——
Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield before he gets to his third point?
Mr. BENNET. Certainly.
Mr. FESS. Has the railroad no option as to whether they carry the mail or not?
Mr. BENNET. Oh, it can stop running its road. It has this option, that it does not have to run the road. Well, I am not so sure about that. I think it must run the road.
Mr. MADDEN. That is not an interstate road.
Mr. BENNET. Oh, I asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that exact question. I said, suppose the railroad is entirely within the State of Tennessee or New York——
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more; he is making a very interesting statement, and I am sure the committee will be interested to hear him for five minutes further.
Mr. BENNET. I thank the gentleman.
Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BENNET. Certainly.
Mr. FESS. I want some information. Is it possible that there is a contract here on both sides where the railroad has no part in the contract?
Mr. BENNET. Is the gentleman speaking of this railroad?
Mr. FESS. I am speaking in reference to the Post Office bill, of which the gentleman spoke.
Mr. BENNET. Why, of course, under the provisions of the Post Office bill in the gentleman's State of Ohio, if there is a railroad entirely within the State of Ohio, operating just on a fair margin of profit, the Postmaster General, if the law is valid, can go to that railroad and say, if it does not now carry the mail, "You must carry the mail," and he can fix the price, and if they do not carry the mail he can fine them at least $5,000 and, I think, possibly $5,000 a day. Now I ask the gentleman from Ohio does he think, with that on the statute books, it is not on them yet—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was very fair, and I complimented him on the character of his legal argument——
Mr. MADDEN. All the members of the Post Office Committee are fair.
Mr. BENNET. Surely.
Mr. MADDEN. Especially the gentleman from New York.
Mr. BENNET. Exactly; they did not give me the pneumatic tube yet, but they will——
Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman would have had his pneumatic tube——
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MADDEN (continuing). The gentleman would have had his pneumatic tube but for the fact the committee had reported the bill too early for the consideration of it.
Mr. BENNET. I appreciate that.
Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BENNET. I yield.
Mr. SLOAN. Just for the purpose of having the record clear, after the gentleman from New York observed that the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was very fair, and that the members were fair, I just want to state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, so that the record may be complete.
Mr. BENNET. Of course; and I have stated that he is one of the best and fairest. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] was absolutely fair. I asked him, in putting my question about that intrastate railroad, where he got his authority, and he said very frankly out of the provision of the Constitution which gave the Postmaster General authority to establish post offices and post roads, but that he himself was not clear in his own mind as to the exact scope of the wording; that it was until now an unused power of the Constitution, and that he thought it was a good thing to test it out.
Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit me, would he say the Constitution recognizes the Postmaster General; does it?
Mr. BENNET. Of course, it does not. It must have been under the powers of Congress.
Mr. FESS. Yes; of Congress.
Mr. BENNET. I thank the gentleman for the correction.
Mr. FESS. I would like to have this statement from the gentleman from New York. If the railroad has no part in the making of the contract, how will that law stand when it reaches the Supreme Court of the United States?
Mr. BENNET. Well, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] says, and I do not know whether it will stand or not, but it is one of the unused powers imposed upon Congress by the Constitution, that he thought that power ought to be tested out by an action going to the Supreme Court of the United States so that the power of Congress should be defined.
Mr. STEENERSON. Did not the gentleman from Tennessee also state that there was another provision of the Constitution which provided that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation, and that the two provisions, the one in reference to the establishment of post offices and post roads and that private property should not be taken without compensation, should be construed together?
Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Tennessee did call the attention of the House to the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution in his very able argument on that subject, and I would have mentioned it if there was any point to it, but I did not see the point to that observation or any relevancy to this proceeding.

Mr. FESS. If it is exercising the power of eminent domain, such as the gentleman referred to, does that mean the Government is taking over this railroad property for its own use?

Mr. BENNET. I think if the gentleman from Tennessee's argument was followed to its logical conclusion, he must contend that under that power the Government would have the right by the exercise of something akin to eminent domain to take over highways, railroads, and any other property necessary to establish post offices and post roads, and that is why he said it was an unused power. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the gentleman's contention that every highway over which the post is carried is thereby constituted a post road?

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, that is not the contention of the gentleman from New York.

The gentleman from New York is making no contention at all in relation to that, except to call the attention, particularly of the lawyers of this body, to what the provision does for the sale of a railroad under circumstances such as this 17-mile railroad that is to be sold out there in Idaho.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BENNET. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. This 17 miles of trackage now being a railroad that is not engaged in the carrying of the mails, how can the gentleman consider that it could be made a post road without action of Congress and subject it to the conditions and limitations prescribed in the Post Office appropriation bill that recently passed this House?

Mr. BENNET. Why, Mr. Chairman, the proposition is perfectly clear. Let us assume that everything that the gentleman from Wisconsin says is necessary in order to constitute a post road. Let us assume that, but not admit it except for the purpose of the argument. Then the gentleman that bought the railroad would be subjected to the additional uncertainty. As it is to-day, he is subjected to the uncertainty of whether he will be required by the Postmaster General to carry the mail; and I can not say offhand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BENNET. If I could have five minutes from somebody else I would like to talk about that third point.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes, because I want to ask him a question. As I understand, the gentleman makes the point there will be no sale of this railroad because the Postmaster General might require the purchaser to carry the mail?

Mr. BENNET. Not quite that. My point is this, that on the sale one of two things would happen: Either the Government would have to buy it in itself or the purchaser who did buy it would not pay the amount that he would pay but for this restriction, and therefore the price would be low. Every cloud on a title—and that is what this is—reduces the price that is obtained at a sale. And my contention is that on a 17-mile railroad, in particular, the fact that the Postmaster General or Congress can make that a post road and require the mails to be carried at any price to be fixed is a cloud.

Now, I call my friend's attention, before he asks me a further question, to another thing. We ought to protect the reputation of our executive officials. Now, every day we are all assailed from some direction or another, and executive officials are no exception. You pass this $5,000 provision, and put it in the hands of anybody who attends that sale, in the right of anyone who attends that sale, to say as to the successful bidder, "Oh, yes; he bid safely, probably, because he knew under this provision in the Post Office bill he would not be held down to even the maximum price; that he would get the benefit of the provision that the Postmaster General could give him more." In other words, the certainty of the statute that ought to be present in connection with executive officials is gone.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks this road ought not to be sold, because of the danger he speaks of and which he has just discussed, that the Government ought to retain the ownership of this railroad and operate it, because there would be some danger to the purchaser from the Postmaster General?

Mr. BENNET. I do not agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I think the railroad ought to be sold.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I want to make a statement to the gentleman to clear up this proposition. This railroad runs out to the dam site, as I understand it. The dam site is some 20 or 25 miles above the irrigable land where the settlements are, and that from the dam site down to the irrigable land where the people live there are no settlers, as I understand it.

Mr. BENNET. You mean not by a dam site? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Texas. And practically there are no people out along the railroad. There is no post office yet, as I understand it, at the dam site, and therefore there is hardly any probability there will be any mail to be carried.

Mr. MADDEN. There is a summer resort there, is there not?

Mr. BENNET. No; I think not.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I understood him to make the remark that there were four people living up at the end of the railroad.

Mr. BENNET. Those four people live out there by the dam site.

Mr. HICKS. Does the gentleman think that railroad is a going proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know whether the gentlemen are discussing the proposition of whether this is a dam or a dam site? [Laughter.]

Mr. HICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman how much he thinks the railroad will be worth as a going proposition?

Mr. BENNET. It is worth a good deal less with this cloud on the title. My friend from New York owns real estate, and he will agree with me that with a cloud on the title at a public sale it tremendously reduces the price that real estate brings.

Mr. HICKS. My lawyer is the best judge on that.

Mr. NORTON. I was not clear whether my friend from New York was going to bid on this railroad or not, but I was very much edified at his remarks. I was particularly interested in the gentleman's statement relative to the fact that the last Post Office appropriation bill provided for the interests of the cities a great deal better than any appropriation bill of that kind that had been passed during the last 10 years. If the gentleman has time, I would be glad if he would take some of it to point out the advantages which that bill affords to the cities.

Mr. BENNET. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to prove that. I will simply admit it. I have read the bill, and it would take a good deal more time than the two minutes that I think I have remaining to explain to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to my colleague [Mr. MANN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes from the Department of the Interior and was drafted in that department, as is disclosed by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands. The Secretary of the Interior, under date of February 1 last, transmitted a draft of the bill to the gentleman from Texas, with this letter:

> The Reclamation Service has heretofore constructed a railroad between Barber Junction, on the Oregon Short Line Railway out of Boise, Idaho, and Arrowrock Dam. The railroad is standard guage and is 17 miles long, with about 1 mile of spurs and sidings. All equipment necessary for operating the road is available. It was built for use in connection with the Boise project, Idaho, and is no longer needed by the Government. An attempt was made to lease the road, and accordingly advertisements were prepared and proposals were to have been opened at 2 o'clock November 22, 1915, by the senior engineer at Boise, Idaho, but no proposals were received.

Then the Secretary makes the statement that the Government no longer needs the road, and that it is advisable to sell it; and he transmits a bill which authorizes him to have the railroad appraised and then, upon bids, sold to the highest bidder; and then, if there be no bid, he can give it away.

It may be desirable to give it away. I do not undertake to say; but to say that this road is ever to be sold to the highest bidder is the height of humor. No serious man will contend for it. The road was offered for lease and no one would lease it.

Since when will a man who wants to operate a railroad and can obtain it without putting any capital in prefer to have a large capital account upon which he must have a return? Why would a man buy the road who would refuse to lease it at a cent a year? Why should somebody invest in a road who was unwilling to undertake the operation of it without any capital charge at all?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield; but I might reach the point that the gentleman probably will—the point that the gentleman has in his mind. At least, I have a clear-cut argument in my mind.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am wondering how the Government could justify itself in keeping a railroad for lease when the purpose for which it was constructed had been achieved and we had no further use for it.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has the right to wonder. I would not take away that privilege from the gentleman.

Now, why would anyone lease the road? It is certainly patent to anyone that no one would buy the road if no one would lease it. Why did they get no proposals for the lease of the road? Because there is only one of two concerns that could operate the road, and they have an understanding between themselves. They did not desire to lease the road because they wanted to purchase it for nothing.

The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] whether he was contemplating the purchase of the road. No one can operate this road except either the Oregon Short Line or the Barber Lumber Co., or their subsidiary companies, the name of which I do not for the moment recall.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it possible that there might be a purchaser for this road for the purpose of getting the lumber that is in it and moving it to some other place?

Mr. MANN. I do not. There decidedly could not be. This road is a necessity to the Barber Lumber Co. at present. They made a contract with the Government under which they give to the Government certain rights of way, the Barber Lumber Co. owning part of the land and the Government owning part of the land and the Oregon Short Line Railroad owning part of the land.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the town of Barberton is 8 miles from Boise, and the Arrowrock Dam is 17 miles beyond Barberton, so that the road beyond Barberton is worthless to the Barber Lumber Co. or to the Oregon Short Line, except possibly for running excursions to the dam. So far as the Barber Lumber Co. is concerned, it could not use the part of the road from Barberton to the dam to any advantage.

Mr. MANN. They do not have to do that until they buy it. If the gentleman will just possess his soul in patience until I make my statement, I think I can make it clear-cut. The land belongs to three concerns—the Barber Lumber Co., the Oregon Short Line, and the Government. The Government made a contract with each of these two companies, and under the contract with the Barber Lumber Co., the Barber Lumber Co., if the Government does not operate the road, is entitled to use the right of way itself. If the contract of sale is not made, the Barber Lumber Co. will still maintain the road. If a contract of sale is made, it is subject to the contract with the Barber Lumber Co., and the purchaser acquires practically no rights, because the only freight that passes over the road is the freight of the Barber Lumber Co., except the little that goes up to the dam. The Barber Lumber Co. operates the road and pays 50 cents a train mile for the maintenance of the right of way or for use.

Now, who is going to buy a railroad under such circumstances? Nobody except the Barber Lumber Co. The Barber Lumber Co. is given a right to build a railroad over this right of way if the Government ceases to operate it, in any event, and I suppose they would pay a dollar for the road. They ought to be made to lease the road. They refused to lease it. Why? Because they thought they would get it cheaper by buying it. Why, how could a man be induced to lease a thing for a year for a hundred dollars if he could buy it outright for $10? Nobody else could bid.

If gentlemen insist that the Government ought to maintain the road, the moment they give it up, it practically belongs to the Barber Lumber Co.; the moment they give it up, the Barber Lumber Co. is the only beneficiary; and if they sell it, the Barber Lumber Co. is the only purchaser.

Mr. BENNET. If this railroad runs up to this dam, why would not the Government have to bid against the Barber Lumber Co. in order to have a railroad to go up to the dam?

Mr. MANN. The Government owns the road, and so it could not put it up for sale and bid for it at the sale. Now I want to accomplish the purpose the gentleman has in mind, by not having the Government sell the road.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman wants the Government to retain ownership?

Mr. MANN. Yes; let the Government lease the road to the Barber Lumber Co. If the Government refuses to sell the road, the Barber Lumber Co. will be compelled to lease it. Now, the Barber Lumber Co. refused to put in a bid for leasing the road, because they wanted to buy it for less than they could get a lease for.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I do not believe the Barber Lumber Co. have any use for that road beyond the town of Barberton, a distance of 17 miles.

Mr. MANN. That may all be. I am not saying that they have. Nobody has any use for the road beyond the town of Barberton.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; it runs up to a dam. There may be a little freight that goes up there. It would be cheaper to carry it up on mule back than it would be to maintain a railroad up there to carry it; and as for this fairy tale about thousands of people going up there to see the dam, and paying the Government great sums of money in the way of railroad fare, that is too idle a dream for me to consider seriously.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Will the gentleman be willing to come out there and make a trip to this dam?

Mr. MANN. It would be a happy day for me, Mr. Chairman, if I had the power and the possibility of doing it.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I hope we will be able to induce the gentleman to come out there.

Mr. MANN. I hope I will be able to come, and that you will let this matter remain in statu quo until I do. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said he would not sell the road, but would compel the Barber Lumber Co. to lease it. How can that be done?

Mr. MANN. By refusing to sell it.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I understood the gentleman to state a while ago that when the Government ceased to operate it, the road would belong to the company.

Mr. MANN. No; I did not say the railroad would belong to the company. I said the right of way would belong to the company. Of course, we could not compel the Barber Lumber Co. as a legal proposition to lease the road. That is perfectly patent; but the Barber Lumber Co. will keep this road there. It is not going to disappear until the lumber owned by the Barber Lumber Co. is cut off and taken away.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. My recollection is that one of the terms of the contract is that if the Government ceases to operate it, then the lumber company shall operate it, and there is no provision that any sum shall be paid to the Government for the use of it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's recollection is not good. The provision of the contract is that if the Government shall refuse to operate the railroad, the Barber Lumber Co. may operate it and charge against the Government the amount that it otherwise would pay to the Government for its trackage rights.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes; I know that. The gentleman is mistaken when he says I do not understand the terms of the contract.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken in what he said or else I misunderstood him, and it does not make any difference which. I will read the provision:

ART. 5. It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the United States will maintain said railroad in good operating condition until the completion of the Arrowrock Dam, unless the construction of said dam be hereafter abandoned. If at any time, either before or after completion of the said dam, the said railroad while operated, owned, or controlled by the party of the first part shall not be in proper condition for the safe operation of trains thereover, the party of the second part, its successors, or assigns, in case of failure of the United States to promptly make the necessary repairs after five days from receipt of written demand therefor, shall have the right to put such railroad in safe condition and deduct the expense thereof from any charges due, or to become due, to the United States for trackage rights hereunder, but the United States shall not be liable in case the expense for repairs in any calendar year shall exceed the charges due for the said year.

The Barber Lumber Co. now operates the railroad as far as its own trains are concerned. The Government does not operate the trains for the Barber Lumber Co. Here is a railroad which the Barber Lumber Co. must have, and it is proposed to sell it to them on their own terms, and give as a reason for that the fact that they have refused to lease it. Why, they refused to lease it in order that the Interior Department might say, "We can not lease this road; we must sell it." Nobody else will buy it. Nobody else can buy it under the terms of these contracts. I think we ought to refuse to sell the road, and let the Barber Lumber Co. and the Interior Department make an arrangement about the leasing of the road. There is certainly no possible object in going to the expense of appraising the road and then advertising for bids, knowing that no one will bid the appraised value of the road for it, and then say that the Interior Department can sell it on the best terms that they can get. It is in the nature of a white elephant. We want to get rid of it. The other fellows want to get it for nothing, but they have got to have it. It is a white elephant on our hands, but it is an asset in their hands. Let them pay for it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Texas use some of his time now?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not know of anyone on this side who wants to speak.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to have some time in favor of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. How much time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Ten minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the resolution of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the resolutions considered yesterday by the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the eight-hour day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the eight-hour day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENNET. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of national prohibition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of national prohibition. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois has 20 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, while I agree in part with the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I can not agree with his conclusions that it is for the best interests of the Government to retain the road and not sell it. Anyone who has any acquaintance with——

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just yet; I want to complete my sentence. Any person who has any acquaintance with a lumber railroad in a mountainous district such as this is knows that when the original purpose of the railroad is fulfilled the road is generally of little value except for the purposes of junk.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not yield to the gentleman from Illinois; if I did I would have to yield to the gentleman from New York, and I do not want to play favorites. I wish the Chair would kindly protect me for a few minutes until I can make a consecutive statement, because I am limited as to time.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for gentlemen on this side of the House to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are plenty of vacant seats on this side, and if the gentleman wants to hear me he can come over here, as I do not intend to go over there.

Mr. Chairman, this is a practical question confronting the Government. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the sale of this railroad. The Government has no further use of it, and we will have to sell it for a sum very much below the cost of its construction. To retain it and try to obtain a lease from the Barber Lumber Co. or the subsidiary company would be continuing the waste, because under the agreement originally entered into with the company the Government must continue its operation, and it is being operated at a loss. So what is the practical condition confronting the House? It is to get rid of it as soon as possible.

I do not agree with certain provisions of the bill hinted at in some remarks which I made and questions I put to the chairman of the committee. I think it is a waste of time to offer the railroad at public auction at not less than the appraised price, because if there is no settlement at the terminus of this road and the Barber Lumber Co. is the only concern which has any use for it, and that for logging purposes, it can not be expected that there will be any purchaser at public auction or anyone to bid the price appraised. I question whether there is any reason for having the property appraised. The Secretary of the Interior knows what it cost the Government to build the railroad. He knows full well what the depreciation is, and he is in possession of all the facts, and when you prescribe in the bill that there shall be an appraisal and notice given to the public that it will be disposed of at public auction, you are just deferring the time when the road must be sold, and you are also to that extent compelling the Government to waste its funds in its continued operation. The sooner the Government can get rid of something no longer wanted, the better it is for the interest of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think there is a good deal of force in what the gentleman has said. These provisions were put in the bill by the Secretary of the Interior himself, and I surmise one was for his own protection, that the property should be appraised by a disinterested person, and that he should make the sale with some reference to the value as fixed by the appraisers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman from Texas has surmised the motive back of the Secretary in putting in that provision. I agree that the Secretary thought that he would be open to criticism if he presented a bill asking for a private sale without appraisement and without submitting it to public sale, but if he had come before the committee with a letter stating the conditions as they have been submitted to-day, showing that here is a branch railroad running from Boise City 9 miles to Barbertown, and then a spur further up the canyon to the new Arrow Rock Dam 8 miles, for which there is no use except to a logging company, he would have made a strong case for an exceptional condition of sale by private rather than at public sale.

What is the use of going through the mockery of offering this road for sale at public auction at an appraised value, when we all know that the Government will not receive a bid of one-quarter of the appraisement of this property? It is an absolute waste of time, and will result in a loss to the Government by the railroad being compelled to be maintained by the Government, as provided in the agreement with the Barber Lumber Co.

The terms of the agreement with the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. are not burdensome, and any purchaser would not refrain from purchasing the railroad because of those terms. They are reasonable, but there are some onerous terms in connection with the agreement entered into between the Government and the Barber Lumber Co. I am surprised that the Government entered into any such agreement as it did with the Barber Lumber Co., because it gave them for all time, so long as it was operated by the Government or by its assignees, the privilege of operating any train for its purpose of logging, and paying only therefor the nominal rate—or you may say a reasonable rate—of 50 cents per train-mile. No person, I think, would be willing to go and bid for this railroad, subject to those conditions, because they would not want to have the operation interfered with by these private parties. The Government, having entered into this contract, with these burdensome terms, as I consider them, it is for the best interest of the Government to get rid of it for the best price that can be secured.

It is of no value whatsoever to the Government to-day. As is suggested by the Representatives from the State of Idaho, if the city of Boise desires to purchase it, I would be almost willing to give it to that city, because it will find out sooner or later that it has a white elephant on its hands. It has served its purpose, and the quicker we get rid of it the better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who wishes to speak against the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this bill, it seems to me, might be amended in certain particulars. In the first place, the Secretary of the Interior indicates in his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands that "all equipment necessary for operating the road is available." In the bill it is proposed to give to the Secretary of the Interior the right to sell the right of way, and "such part of the equipment and appurtenances used in connection therewith as he shall deem most profitable or economical to sell in connection with said railroad."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. At the back of this dam there is a lake 30 miles long, and I do not know exactly how wide, created by the flood waters of the mountains, and does not the gentleman think that a great summer resort could be created there which would make this railroad very much more valuable?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would depend very largely upon the population of Boise and the population adjacent to the lake. As the representative of a section adjacent to which we have great seaside summer resorts, I should hesitate to stir up a rivalry along this 17-mile railroad on an artificial lake in the State of Idaho. Still I would be pleased to see such an enterprise developed if the capitalists and pleasure seekers cared to indulge in it. It might be that these 17 miles of railroad could be so improved and made so attractive as to induce the swain of the community and the families and their children, to indulge in picnics along the banks of the lake, and to build cottages there in order that their summer months might be more agreeably spent. It would probably depend on weather conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. In a case of that sort, does not the gentleman think that the railroad would have a great value in carrying the excursionists?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It probably would, if it did not have to meet an excessive railway mail pay, with which the gentleman from Illinois, of course, is particularly familiar in view of his championship of the recent Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government pays for the railway mails, the gentleman must know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might be one reason why the Government wants to get rid of the railroad. I do not know. It did occur to me incidentally that the railway mail pay charges were so heavy on the short lines, as some of us were led to believe during the discussion of the Post Office appropriation bill, that the Government would have too much of a burden to bear in paying the railway mail pay and, therefore, it would be cheaper to get rid of the road and let somebody else pay it. That involves, however, a question that I had not thought of discussing at any length. I agree with my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. BENNET] that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] having given careful attention to the Railway Mail Service is entitled to very great credit not only for his intelligent study of that question, but for the remarkable assiduity he has exercised to bring about legislation that is effective. I would not pluck a laurel from his brow in that regard, even though I might think it wise for the Government to relieve itself of the necessity of paying the railway mail pay on this 17-mile railroad, which it seems the Government now desires to abandon.

But I intended to say with respect to the bill that while the Secretary of the Interior indicates that the equipment is available, the bill does not propose to sell the equipment except such part of it as the Secretary may think most profitable or economical to sell. I have been wondering whether there was such equipment of the road as was not to be sold under the provisions of the bill and, if so, why. The bill also provides that the road shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder at not less than a value to be appraised by three disinterested persons to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and that public notice of the sale is to be given by posting upon the premises and "by publication once a week for not less than four weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the railroad."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is not a very wide publicity. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET. Does the Secretary in his letter say anything about that particular provision, and in connection with that does the gentleman approve of the habit which we have fallen into here of passing bills simply because some Secretary sends a letter, prepared by some clerk, saying that we ought to pass a bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think Secretary Lane is one of the most efficient of the Secretaries under the present administration.

Mr. BENNET. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would assume that he signed this letter himself, but I do not think that he carefully read the bill which has been submitted to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I have some more time?

Mr. MADDEN. I am afraid I can not yield any more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to discuss the question of Government ownership.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well. In that case, I will be glad to yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, of course, any Member of the House who can not fully discuss the question of Government ownership in two minutes is not well qualified for the high and responsible position he holds, but it has occurred to me that while the bill is deficient in some particulars, in that not sufficient public notice is to be given as to the sale by auction, for instance, and in that if the auction sale fails on insufficient notice, then the Secretary is to have exclusive power to sell at private sale; and leaving aside the question of railway mail pay, upon which I do not expect to harp too often, nor to the displeasure of any of my colleagues upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the question of Government ownership does enter into this little bill that we have before us. The tendency recently has been to drive the Government into competition with private business in all directions—taking over railroads, taking over the telegraph and telephone lines, taking up the enterprises that ought to be left to individuals—are all freely suggested.

Here is an instance where it is proposed to take the Government out of the railroad business—in which we put it in in Alaska—and let private individuals take the business from the Government. Now, I assume that if this was a profitable railroad the Secretary of the Interior would not care to dispose of it, but I assume it is not very profitable, having only one engine and two cars, as I am informed, and being up against a rather stiff proposition if it is to carry the mail under the more or less compulsory law recently passed, where it might have to pay eight or ten thousand dollars for a steel car to safeguard the carriers of the railway mail. It might be a good thing for the Government to let this railroad go on proper terms and let individual enterprise step in and assume the responsibility if it can be done without prejudice to these agreements which seem to enter into the entire transaction. I do not like to see the Government embark in any enterprises that take away from individual enterprise the incentive to organize and conduct business, and while I think this bill ought to be amended I rather agree in principle with the suggestion that just as soon as the Government can let go of the railroad, whether it be operated upon a profitable, or as in this case it seems to be an unprofitable, basis, it would be well to do so. So if this bill were amended properly and there was sufficient publication, it seems to me just as well to let the Government go out of the business and let some private individual go in. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. MCCRACKEN].

Mr. MCCRACKEN. Mr. Chairman, the Arrowrock Dam is located about 25 miles up the Boise River from the beautiful city of Boise, which is the capitol of Idaho. The cost of its construction was $5,500,000, which is $2,000,000 less than the estimate. Six years was the time allotted for its construction, but it was finished in four years. Great credit is due to the United States Reclamation Service for this achievement, and special mention is due to Mr. F. E. Weymouth, supervising engineer of the Idaho district; Mr. Charles H. Paul, construction engineer; and James Munn, superintendent of construction. This is the highest dam in the world, it being 351 feet from the crest of the lowest point of its foundations. It is 1,100 feet long and 240 feet wide at its base, tapering to 16 feet at the top. The table below shows the height of this and other very high dams:

Name of structure.	Height from foundation.	Height from water surface.
	Feet.	Feet.
Arrowrock Dam	351	260
Shoshone Dam	328	240
Croton Dam	297	160
Roosevelt Dam	284	240

This great dam forms a reservoir 18 miles long, with a maximum depth of 200 feet, for conserving the water of the Boise River, which will be used, together with water from the Deer

Flat Reservoir, as a late season water supply for the irrigation of more than 240,000 acres of land in one of the most beautiful valleys in the world—the Boise Valley. Climatic conditions in the valley are ideal. The average elevation of the lands which will benefit by the water of this reservoir is 2,500 feet above sea level. The average range of temperature is from 28° to 97°. Zero weather is rare. The soil on the Boise irrigation project is very rich, being a decomposed volcanic ash. The principal crops are alfalfa, of which we have three cuttings, and a large yield of grains, potatoes, and vegetables. Apples of the best varieties are grown with profit, among some of these being the Jonathan, Rome Beauty, and Grimes Golden. The Italian prune is always a sure crop and the price is gradually increasing. The time is not far distant when the prune orchardist will receive $50 per ton for his product on board the car.

In the year 1915 the acreage under cultivation was approximately 93,000 and its valuation in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. Owing to the climatic conditions and the alfalfa yield, the project will soon take its place as one of the great dairy sections of the world.

The policy of the Government in building this great dam has been justified by the saving of crops last year on more than 100,000 acres. Thus, in the very first season of its use its cost was more than repaid to the Government in the output of food supplies from a district which could not have produced without the water which was therein conserved.

This achievement of the Government in the conservation of the water supply for use in arid regions should be followed by many others, and I want to call the attention of the House to two bills which I have introduced which contemplate the construction of other dams for the conservation of the flood waters of the Snake River and its tributaries. House bill 301 contemplates the construction of the Swan Valley Reservoir at an expense not exceeding $300,000; the Teton Reservoir at an expense not exceeding $1,000,000; the Island Park Reservoir at an expense not exceeding $1,000,000; and the Henry Lake Reservoir at an expense not exceeding $100,000.

If this bill is enacted into law and these reservoirs constructed a good supply of water in dry seasons will be available to the farmers in the upper Snake River Valley, so that they will run no risk of losing their crops just about the time of their maturity.

The other bill which I have introduced contemplates the purchase of a reservoir site in the vicinity of American Falls, to be followed by the construction of a great dam which will hold back enough water to supply the Minidoka project and both north and south sides of the Twin Falls tract when they run short and need it.

The need of an abundant reserve supply of water in the dry season was greatly emphasized in the season of 1915. You have the proof that the value of the crops saved on the Boise project during last season would more than offset the cost of the great Arrowrock Dam, and I want to assure you that the value of the crops which can be saved every year by the use of the water it is proposed to conserve in the Upper and Lower Snake River Valleys will more than equal the cost of the investment which I am now urging the Government to make. I regret that this important matter can not be considered now on account of the "preparedness bills," but I hope that you may understand that this country can not take a better step toward preparedness than to increase our food supply. It may not be known to you gentlemen that we have two towns in Idaho which now rank as the largest primary wheat-shipping points in the world; one of these is American Falls, located in Power County, on the Snake River, and the other is Rexburg, Madison County, between the North and South Forks of the Snake River. More than 1,000,000 bushels of grain were shipped from each of these places in the year 1915. All that the other sections of Idaho need to enable them to equal the productions of the localities named is an adequate water supply. I am sure that no one appreciates the future of the great State of Idaho more than the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I am sure that if he finds time to go out there next summer it will be very difficult to get him back here to attend the session next fall.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has made it clear to me that Idaho is one of the coming States of the great Northwest, and I will say that I am in full sympathy with his plan to conserve the waters of the great Snake River Basin, to which he has referred, in order that there may be no shortage of water needed for irrigation in dry seasons, and that still greater areas of arid lands may be brought to their highest development. Whenever my time will permit, I hope to visit the gentleman's State and see some of the great things which the brains and energy of that country have achieved.

Mr. McCRACKEN. I am sure that the gentleman will be greatly pleased with his visit to the Gem State.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a copy of a letter written to the honorable Speaker of this House by the Hon. Samuel Gompers, touching the Borland rider, so called.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert a letter written to the Speaker of the House by the Hon. Samuel Gompers. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on preparedness.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on preparedness. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Twenty-eighth Ward Democratic Club, of Chicago, favoring a resolution warning all citizens to keep off of armed belligerent vessels or any other kind of belligerent vessels by which they endanger their lives and endanger the involving of this Government in the present European bloody struggle.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from New York [Mr. SMITH] may have leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. SMITH] be granted unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of the McLemore resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield half a minute, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN].

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a bill I have introduced in the House on the question of raising revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of the McLemore resolution. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to my colleague [Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS].

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the question of the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of the McLemore resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the McLemore resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the McLemore resolution. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, when the discussion began upon this measure before the committee I was inclined to vote for it. It seemed to me that it was a reasonable proposition, but I have been listening to the debate, and especially to the discussion of the Member from Idaho [Mr. McCRACKEN], and it convinced me that we ought not to sell this road. He says that this great dam, that cost $5,000,000, has created a great body of backwater, and it gives unusual promise for a great summer resort. It is making already a wonderfully beautiful city—the greatest coming city of the Northwest—and therefore I think we ought not at this time to foolishly part with the railroad.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BENNET. Did not the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. McCRACKEN] say that the temperature there always ranged around 30° above—between 10° below and 30° above? And I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if that is the range of temperature in Boise, and this dam is higher up, where it is presumably colder, what reason will there be for people who live in weather where it never gets warmer than 20° above to have a summer resort?

Mr. FESS. I presume that will be for the purpose of skating facilities.

Mr. BENNET. I admire the agility with which the gentleman can change his mental operations.

Mr. FESS. Well, that is necessary in these days. [Laughter.]

Then I am convinced from another angle, and that was the angle announced by the Member from New York, who just interrupted me by my permission, in his statement that nobody would buy it, because they would be buying a lawsuit. He raised a question that I think is quite pertinent here and has been in the minds of many Members in the discussion of the railway mail pay proposition, in which it seems that a contract has been made where only one party is regarded or consulted in the making of the contract; and I have my serious doubts whether a contract of that sort, especially when applying to a road entirely intrastate, will stand the test if it ever gets before the Supreme Court. And I am not sure that it will ever get there, because it is a question whether any corporation can have such legal process against the Government by which it can go through the regular proceedings of legal procedure to reach the Supreme Court.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. BENNET. I can tell him in a minute how it can be done. Take this 17-mile railroad, and it might be well used for a test case. Somebody buys it. Some time in the future the Postmaster General asks it to carry the mail, and it refuses. Then suit is commenced for the $5,000 penalty, and it goes up by regular processes. I will not undertake to say offhand that there is a direct appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but under the power frequently exercised—not frequently, but whenever necessary—the matter could be brought by certiorari from that particular circuit, which I think is the ninth circuit, and the case brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States. So, on this 17-mile railroad, if Barber & Co. bought it, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says they must, the Government of the United States could make a test case right there; and the danger of that—supposing they bought of some man who did not care very much about it and put up only a nominal defense—would be that then the case would go to the Supreme Court of the United States with only one side adequately represented.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman time to answer my question.

Mr. BENNET. Very well.

Mr. FESS. Can the Federal Government be made a defendant in a suit at law without going to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BENNET. Not under ordinary circumstances. But that would not arise in this case, because the Federal Government would not be the plaintiff. You see the $5,000 fine is imposed on the railroad. The railroad has no interest in the litigation until it is sued, and once it is sued, if it is beaten in the court of first instance, then it has a perfect right of appeal.

Mr. FESS. I accept the gentleman's explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Another consideration which was raised here, which I think important, was the feature of the Constitution which gives the Government the right to exercise the power of eminent domain. Now, if we resort to that, it is a question in my mind whether the title has not passed over from the railroad into the possession of the Government; and if so, is this a method by which we can stop private ownership in railroads and take up Government ownership? And is that one of the plans contemplated by legislation of this sort? I think that is a pertinent question.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BENNET. It is a very pertinent question, and it is very serious in relation to the 900 short-line railroads in the United States. If that Post Office appropriation bill becomes a law with this provision in it and the Postmaster General exercises his power and commences suits, it would not be very long before a whole lot of railroads in this country would be in Government ownership by reason of judgments and that kind of buying in of railroads, especially the short-line railroads and the roads that are heavily bonded. Of course that brings in the complications between the bondholders and the Government, but we have not time to discuss that this afternoon.

Mr. FESS. I agree with the explanation offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and I ask now, If it is intended by this policy that the Government shall take charge of the railroads, why sell this railroad? This is pertinent at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] wish to use any more of his time? If not, I have no objection to going ahead and having the bill read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I do not care to use more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill, if there is no further discussion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior the Boise & Arrow Rock Railroad, constructed by the Reclamation Service under the provisions of the act of Congress of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), for use in connection with the construction of the Arrowrock Dam, Boise project, is no longer needed for said construction purpose, the said Secretary of the Interior may cause said railroad, together with the right of way on which the same is located, and such part of the equipment and appurtenances used in connection therewith as he shall deem most profitable or economical to sell in connection with said railroad, to be appraised by three disinterested persons, to be appointed by him, and thereafter to sell the same for not less than the appraised value at public auction to the highest bidder, after giving public notice of the time and place of sale by posting upon the premises and by publication once a week for not less than four weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the railroad, the proceeds of such sale to be covered into the reclamation fund and credited to the Boise project, and such credit applied upon the features of said project against which the cost of the construction of said railroad was charged: Provided, That said Secretary may reject any or all bids: Provided further, That after said railroad has once been offered for sale at public auction and not sold the Secretary may, in his discretion, sell said railroad, together with the equipment and appurtenances aforesaid, at private sale on such terms and conditions and at such price as he may deem to be to the best interest of the Government. Any sale hereunder shall be subject to the terms and conditions of two certain agreements, one dated March 2, 1911, between the United States and the Barber Lumber Co., and the other dated November 18, 1915, between the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. and the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 2, lines 9 and 10, by striking out all after the word "in," following the word "weeks," down to the end of line 10, and inserting in place thereof the following: "three newspapers of general circulation in three cities of 50,000 population."

Mr. BENNET. Fifty thousand or over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; "50,000 population or over."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman submit it in writing?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will write it out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, after the word "in," strike out the words "a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the railroad" and insert "three newspapers of general circulation in three cities of a population of more than 50,000 people."

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman if he would not be willing to leave in the bill what he has proposed to strike out there and put the other part of his amendment in also? Does not the gentleman think that the advertisement ought to be inserted in papers in the vicinity of this railroad as well as in three cities elsewhere of larger population?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think so; but the point is this: When in legal matters it is not desired to give very wide publicity to a legal announcement, the paper of least circulation in the most remote place is usually selected, and as this is a Government transaction, involving Government property, it seems to me there ought to be the widest possible publicity to the advertisement.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I have no objection to that. I have no objection to advertising in three cities, but it also ought to be advertised in newspapers of the immediate vicinity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman from Texas accept that amendment if there is added thereto, after the word "population," the words "cities nearest the railroad"?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I suggest to leave in there "a paper of general circulation," following the "four weeks," "in the vicinity of the railroad," and then adding what the gentleman proposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that. I think it is entirely reasonable to publish the advertisement somewhere in the vicinity.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I suggest to strike out that and add what the gentleman proposes to add.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I accept that.

Mr. BENNET. After the word "railroad," on line 10.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman from Pennsylvania object to adding "the city of Boise"?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would follow the word "railroad" with the words "and three cities of a population of not less than 50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as it now reads, so that the committee may understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "railroad" insert the words "and in three newspapers of general circulation in three cities of a population of not less than 50,000 people."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One of which shall be in the vicinity of the railroad.

Mr. BENNET. That is already provided.

Mr. MANN. It is not necessary to say "a population of not less than 50,000 people." The word "people" is surplusage.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. As I understand the reading of the amendment, it reads "three papers in three cities." I do not think it is clear that the publication is to be in only one paper in each of the three cities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My understanding was that the gentleman wanted to leave the original language stand. I think a newspaper of general circulation in each of three cities would be fair.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. What I wanted to leave in was the words that the gentleman moved to strike out. The point I now make is that the expression "three newspapers in three cities" is not clear to my mind, though it may be to the gentleman's mind, that it means only one paper in each of three cities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I had no opportunity to write this amendment, but the purpose of it was to give a wider publicity than the bill provides.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I can perfect the language in a moment, I think, if the gentleman will let me do it in my own time.

Mr. STOUT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion with reference to the amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. STOUT. Of course I think it entirely right that this should have publicity in some other newspapers, and I am going to suggest as a substitute for the gentleman's amendment the following, if he will have it:

After the word "railroad" add "and in three other publications such as may, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, give adequate publicity to the proposal of the Government."

It is desirable that he publish these advertisements in some large financial papers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask what is the population of Boise City just now?

Mr. McCRACKEN. Twenty thousand.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Why not state that it appear in one Boise paper and then in three others?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is satisfactory. Such a proposition as this, I think, ought to be published in San Francisco and Omaha and Denver, perhaps.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman's purpose limited to one paper in a city?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the idea.

Mr. FESS. Had you not better say "in each of three cities?"

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I offer to insert, after the word "weeks," the words—

In a newspaper of general circulation in Boise, and in three newspapers published in cities having a population of not less than 50,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his original amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I desire to withdraw the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to withdraw his original amendment and offer this one?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw his original amendment and offer an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "in," insert the words "Boise City, and in one newspaper published in three cities of a population not less than 50,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, did the Chair submit a request for unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania could withdraw his original amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did, and there was no objection raised.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think that is a sufficient designation? Should he not say "City of Boise, Idaho"?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks that that is not sufficiently descriptive?

Mr. STAFFORD. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the amendment be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "in," insert the words "Boise, and in one newspaper published in each of three cities with a population of not less than 50,000."

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana as a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "in," insert "the city of Boise, Idaho, and in three other publications such as may, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, give adequate publicity to the proposals of the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the substitute except that it gives to the Secretary of the Interior discretion as to the selection of the place, and it might involve the very question that was raised sometime ago, and which seemed to be conceded by the chairman of the committee, as to the selection of remote places in which to place the advertisement. I do not for a moment wish to reflect upon the officer who would exercise discretion under the substitute, but we are to dispose of Government property, the value of which originally was three or four hundred thousand dollars, and there should be the widest publicity by advertisement amongst business and railroad men and others engaged in that kind of business. If you fix a limitation upon the population of the city in which the advertisement is to be inserted you give legislative assurance at least that you are giving the widest possible publicity to your desire to sell. If you leave it to the discretion of the Secretary who has an agreement with other parties in interest, there being two agreements here, it might be that there would be a desire not to give the greatest possible publicity to the sale. It seems to me it would be wise that the advertisement appear in publications in such cities as San Francisco, Chicago, New York, or Philadelphia, where it would be most likely to attract the attention of men who would be inclined to buy.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Chairman, I think it is a far-fetched presumption on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Secretary of the Interior would deliberately place a publication in the newspapers far remote from any possible interested purchaser. Under the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania he could go way over east to Syracuse or Buffalo or Scranton and put it in some little newspaper where it would be utterly lost. My purpose is that it shall go in some of the great financial papers of the country, where men who read it have money to buy railroads, just as they buy bonds, where they are advertised in that kind of a paper. I think the only way the gentleman's amendment could be effective would be for him to come straight out and designate three cities in which the advertisement should be published.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will concede that whoever drew the bill may have had it in mind not to give very wide publicity to the fact that the railroad was to be sold when he put in the bill this language:

After giving public notice of the time and place of sale by posting upon the premises and by publication once a week for not less than four weeks in a newspaper of general circulation in the vicinity of the railroad.

That was not going very far.

My point is that while there may have been no design about this, and I do not impute any design, the language of the bill certainly leaves it open to the suggestion that there was no great desire to get much publicity for this sale.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Montana yield to me until I can ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOUT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from Montana to the fact that his amendment starts in after the word "in," and it seems that the words "in the vicinity of the railroad" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. STOUT. That is true. I move to strike out the words "in the vicinity of the railroad."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the substitute just adopted, strike out the words "the vicinity of the railroad."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the Chair that the substitute has been agreed to, but that the amendment as amended has not been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was endeavoring to first perfect the phraseology.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. We have voted for the substitute of the gentleman from Montana. That substitute has been agreed to, and do we not now have to vote for the original amendment, as amended by the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. The question now is on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAVENPORT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11156 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAMILTON of New York, for one week, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. HEFLIN (on the request of Mr. ALMON), indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. EDWARDS, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ARMED MERCHANTMEN—EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the day a good many Members of the House have called upon me to inquire if there could not be some way arranged by which the ban against the privilege of Members extending remarks in the RECORD relative to the McLemore resolution might be raised. Not having voted for the rule, I believe I am in a situation to suggest that a great many Members on both sides of the House did not agree with the rule, because it did not furnish sufficient opportunity for amendment and debate, as many such were unable to get time to speak. That was the case with myself and with a good many other Members. I think this was one of the most important questions that has come before the House in many years, at least in point of personal interest to Members, and I believe that it is just and right that those who have not been heard because they could not get time to speak should have an opportunity to extend their remarks in the RECORD. It is well known that I am not in favor of padding the RECORD, but I desire now to ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have the privilege for five legislative days of inserting in the RECORD remarks touching the McLemore resolution, and which they would have made had there been time to give all an opportunity to be heard when the resolution was considered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does that include to-day?

Mr. BARNHART. After to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if that is intended to interfere with those who have heretofore gotten permission without limit?

Mr. BARNHART. No. During the day quite a few Members have been given that permission in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and those who have not been present and have not been given that permission will doubtless feel that if they do not have that privilege there has been some discrimination against them, and I think they would be duly justified in feeling so and therefore make the request.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose that some of the Members feel as I do, that the defeat of the McLemore resolution was due to a most vicious influence, and I suppose that in the extension of remarks——

Mr. MANN. Well, it would be only telling the truth.

The SPEAKER. If the request for unanimous consent is granted and gentlemen print speeches in the back of the RECORD, under the rules of the House, they are to use language that is parliamentary and all that.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me to continue, I will say I believe that if I express my honest sentiments and convictions some gentlemen may think I was not perhaps keeping within bounds.

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference what some gentlemen think. They submit the matter to the House and if anybody raises the question that the speech is in unparliamentary language why the House can strike it out, as it has done several times within the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. There might be just as hard thinking on the other side.

The SPEAKER. Of course. The Chair is not speaking of one side or the other.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did object yesterday. One reason I objected was because I was afraid a lot of things would be said in the RECORD which were not said on the floor and which might add seriously to the international complication. Another reason was I wanted the RECORD to show, for once, what actually had taken place on the floor of the House in the discussion of a fairly important proposition. In that hope or expectation I was not successful, for while the temporary RECORD, in the main, shows what did take place on the floor of the House, there were some extensions of remarks without leave, some of them inserted in the body of the RECORD and some at the end of the RECORD, which utterly change the aspect of what really did take place, and looked as though some gentlemen had made some very long speeches on the subject while everybody else was confined to a little time and a few remarks. So under the circumstances, the temporary RECORD showing fairly well but not accurately what took place, I believe I can not persist in the objection, and shall let the permanent RECORD show an awful lie about what did not take place. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the matter of the extension of remarks in the RECORD on this occasion was particularly different from that which occurs from time to time under the gentleman's observation and mine?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think so; I think it is quite a different situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if this general leave to extend remarks is granted, would it warrant Members who voted on one side of the question in extending their remarks in making an argument on the other side of the question?

The SPEAKER. Of course it would.

Mr. MANN. There was quite a bunch, some on that side who favored both sides of the question.

Mr. THOMAS S. WILLIAMS. Then, Mr. Speaker, out of courtesy to Members on the other side of the aisle, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in regard to the remark that gentlemen on this side voted on both sides, I would like to have it understood that some of the Members on this side voted against the rule because they did not want it considered in the House, as it did not belong here, and thus many of them who voted against the rule for that reason, facing the situation we found here because the rule was accepted, were compelled to vote consistently to lay the McLemore resolution on the table.

We subject men to the charge that they voted on both sides. The charge is not fair. It is simply a consistent vote not to consider matters of diplomacy in the House of Representatives, but leave them where they belong—with the President. I will not object, because you granted me the leave to insert my remarks; but you did it, I think, because we could not speak yesterday when the issue was before us, the greatest that has confronted the country since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman withhold that for one second?

Mr. MANN. No. I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SEARS. One minute, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. You can not do that after the point of no quorum is made.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] moves that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, March 9, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Attorney General submitting estimates of deficiencies in appropriations for the Department of Justice and the courts of the United States, required to complete the service for the fiscal year 1916, and for prior years (H. Doc. No. 856); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Librarian of Congress submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for public printing and binding required for the Library of Congress for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (H. Doc. No. 857); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Attorney General submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for salaries, fees, and expenses of marshals, United States courts, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 858); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HINDS, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11254) to conduct investigations and experiments for ameliorating the damage wrought to the fisheries by predacious fishes and aquatic animals, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 309), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2648) granting a pension to Harry N. Gates; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12694) granting an increase of pension to Martha W. Hubbell; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we call upon Thy name, the true and the living God. The character of our approach into Thy presence is our highest reach toward the attainment of the ideals of our national life. Our larger life has never been written into law. Our highest blessings are not in the form of government. We come that we may realize our citizenship in a universal kingdom and our home amidst a brotherhood that is world-wide. Grant us to carry from Thy throne to-day the influences of Thy spirit and grace in the discharge of the duties that are upon us and guide us according to Thy will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, March 3, 1916, when, on request of Mr. JAMES, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Mr. MYERS. I present a petition of sundry homesteaders in the vicinity of Trout Creek, in the State of Montana, favoring more liberal legislation for homesteaders on cut-over and timbered lands. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD with the name of the first signer, followed by the words "and many others."

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TROUT CREEK, MONT.,
February 27, 1916.

The Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned voters of Montana, appreciate your efforts in behalf of the homesteaders on cut-over and timbered lands.

The present letter of the law works an unnecessary hardship on the settler and bars much good farm land from legal settlement.

A law similar to bills introduced by you, or assurance from Secretary of the Interior that leniency will be shown homesteaders on such lands, would be justice and a long step ahead for a poor man who wants to make a home in the wilderness.

Such legislation would not be necessary if the timber was left on the land for the homesteader by the Forest Service.

WM. B. GRAY
(And many others).

Mr. MYERS presented petitions of sundry unit holders of the Flathead reclamation project and of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., praying for an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Flathead reclamation project in Montana, which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a memorial of the Religious Liberty Association of Seventh Day Adventists respecting certain legislation. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial and petition.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States in Congress:

The memorial, representation, and petition of the Religious Liberty Association of Seventh Day Adventists, headquarters in District of Columbia, respectfully represents:

Whereas, through a misunderstanding, we were given no opportunity to present before the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia our objections to Senate bill 645, a bill imposing compulsory Sunday observance upon one special class of workers, we therefore take this means of bringing to your attention several very important reasons why the proposed bill should not be enacted into law:

First. The proposed bill penalizes work done on one day of the week by one class of workers only. Therefore this is clearly class legislation, and as such is unjust and obnoxious and should not be passed by Congress. The Illinois Supreme Court decision on this point is worthy of your consideration:

"How, it may be asked, is the health, comfort, safety, or welfare of society to be injuriously affected by keeping open a barber shop on Sunday? It is a matter of common observation that the barber business as carried on in this State [Illinois] is both quiet and orderly. * * * Moreover, if the merchant, the grocer, the butcher, the druggist, and those engaged in other trades and callings are allowed to open their places of business and carry on their respective avocations during seven days of the week, upon what principle can it be held that a person who may be engaged in the business of barbering may not do the same thing? Why should a discrimination be made against that calling and that alone?" (Ill. Repts., 161, pp. 296–309.)

Secondly, this bill, if enacted, would serve as a precedent for further legislation of a kind never yet enacted by Congress. It would serve to open the door for a flood of religious legislation to follow. It is the first attempt by Congress to penalize honest secular work done on a day considered sacred by most Christians.

Previous Sunday legislation has had the purpose not to penalize honorable work but to make it possible for those who desired to observe Sunday to do so, by not requiring them to work on that day. This is the evident purpose in regulations freeing Government employees from working on Sunday. In some places legislation has been passed such as to make Sunday work by United States revenue officers unnecessary. The closing of courts and Congress on Sunday is of a similar nature. If a local postmaster in a community desiring the post office open on Sunday complies with the popular demand he is not subject to punishment. If Congress desires to hold sessions on Sunday, such an act is neither prohibited nor penalized.

Sunday-closing bills of a temporary nature have been passed concerning Government exhibits in expositions held in certain States out of a deference to local State laws where the exhibitions were held. This is very clear from the fact that at the Panama Pacific Exposition in California, where there are no Sunday laws in the State, the Government exhibits were not closed on that day.

By the proposed legislation Congress would exceed its powers, according to the Senate committee report of January 19, 1829, when a similar question was before the Senate. The position taken in that report was as follows: "The proper object of government is to protect all persons in the enjoyment of their religious as well as civil rights, and not to determine for any whether they shall esteem one day above another or esteem all days alike holy." "American State Papers," Class VII, page 226 et seq.

Hundreds of Seventh-day Adventists have been mercilessly persecuted in the past by being penalized and made to serve in jails and chain gangs because they dared to worship God in harmony with the requirements of the fourth commandment of the Decalogue. There are five indictments of Seventh-day Adventists now pending before the courts in Tennessee and two in Oklahoma for work that was done on Sunday in private and inside of their own premises and to the physical disturbance of no one. Some people are easily disturbed mentally and religiously when they see some practising a dissenting religion. We had hoped that this kind of legislation might remain a relic of the colonial days when there was a union of church and State.

We agree with the official organ of the Knights of Labor—the Journal—that "Any proposition to pass Sunday legislation in the District of Columbia is a direct violation of the Constitution, against the spirit of our institutions, and against the policy heretofore maintained by the Federal Government."

We therefore earnestly protest on grounds of sound American principles against the compulsory Sunday observance bill for barbers (S. 645) as being class legislation, unjust, unconstitutional, partial, religious, and as the first example of a congressional bill to penalize honest and honorable labor done on one specific day of the week, thereby leaving only five working days in the week to anyone keeping another day for religious reasons.

If Congress has the right to close barber shops on Sunday, irrespective of dissenting religious convictions, then it can close schools, sanitariums, publishing houses, etc., where secular duties are performed on Sunday, and thus compel those who observe another day to surrender two days each week. We can not consent to this abridgment of our rights to the free exercise of religion as guaranteed by the first amendment of the Federal Constitution, hence this memorial and petition to each Senator pleading for the preservation of our constitutional rights, as well as those of all the citizens of these United States, earnestly praying, as we are in duty bound, that the Supreme Lawgiver of the universe, by illuminating those to whom it is addressed, may, on the one hand, turn their counsels from every act which would affront His divine prerogative or violate the trust committed to them; and, on the other hand, guide them into every measure which may be worthy of His blessing, redound to their own praise, and establish more firmly the liberties, the prosperity, and the happiness of all the citizens of our favored Republic. And we beg leave to assure you that however earnestly we may contend for the preservation of the free exercise of our religion from the chains and shackles of human authority and the demands of those making opposing claims for spiritual domination by civil powers, we are nevertheless disposed zealously to support the Government of our country and to render a proper and due submission to the lawful exercise of its authority in civil matters.

Signed by the national secretary of the Religious Liberty Association of Seventh-day Adventists; headquarters, Takoma Park, Washington, D. C.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3769) to amend section 3 of an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by limiting the hours of service of employees thereon," approved March 4, 1907, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 245) thereon.

GLENORA G. HARRIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute the bill (S. 3560) to validate certain titles whereon the purchase money has been paid on sales by order of the United States circuit or district court, and I submit a report (No. 221) thereon. It is a small matter, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the sale of real estate to Glenora G. Harris, made by Charles West, Frank D. Houck, and William C. McConnell, receivers of the American Union Telephone Co., for the consideration of $5,000 in cash, which sum was paid by said Glenora G. Harris to the said receivers, and by them distributed to the creditors of said bankrupt corporation, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, under and by virtue of an order or decree of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, at No. 83, June term, 1910, sitting in bankruptcy, said deed being dated the 6th of January, A. D. 1913, and being of record in the recorder's office of the county of Clearfield, in the State of Pennsylvania, in deed book 197, page 250, are hereby validated and confirmed, notwithstanding that said order or decree was for a private instead of a public sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to validate a certain title whereon the purchase money has been paid on a private sale by order of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, at No. 83, June term, 1910, sitting in bankruptcy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the report, which is a very brief one, printed in the RECORD to further explain the measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, without objection.

The report this day submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE is as follows:

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 3560):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred S. 3560, entitled "A bill to validate certain titles, wherein the purchase money has been paid on sales by order of the United States Circuit or District Court," begs leave to report that it has had the same under consideration and recommends that the following amendments be adopted and that the bill as so amended be passed:

1. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That the sale of real estate to Glenora G. Harris, made by Charles West, Frank D. Houck, and William C. McConnell, receivers of the American Union Telephone Company, for the consideration of five thousand dollars in cash, which sum was paid by said Glenora G. Harris to the said receivers, and by them distributed to the creditors of said bankrupt corporation, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, under and by virtue of an order or decree of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, at No. 83, June term, 1910, sitting in bankruptcy, said deed being dated the 6th of January, A. D. 1913, and being of record in the recorder's office of the county of Clearfield, in the State of Pennsylvania, in deed book 197, page 250, are hereby validated and confirmed, notwithstanding that said order or decree was for a private instead of a public sale.

2. Amend the title to read: To validate a certain title whereon the purchase money has been paid on a private sale by order of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania at No. 83, June term, 1910, sitting in bankruptcy.

The object sought in the passage of this bill is to quiet the title to a certain piece of land which was sold and conveyed to the grantee by the receivers of the American Union Telephone Co. under an order of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, made on December 14, 1912, at No. 83, June term, 1910. The decree of the court authorized the real estate in question to be sold at private sale for the sum of $5,000, which had been found by a special master appointed by said court to be its fair market value. Said master had also found that it was for the best interest of the estate "that the said real estate be sold by the American Union receivers at private sale to Glenora G. Harris, for the sum of $5,000, which is a higher and better price than could be procured therefor at public sale." Said report of said master was duly approved and confirmed absolutely by said court. A certified copy of the proceedings of said court in the premises, duly certified by its clerk under date of February 2, 1916, under the seal of said court, substantiating the foregoing facts, is in possession of your committee. The grantee in the deed of conveyance of said property is now advised by counsel that her title to said property is defective in that the sale of said property to her under the decree of said court had been authorized to be made at private sale instead of at a public sale, as required by chapter 225 of the United States Statutes at Large, approved March 3, 1893, as appears in volume 27, at page 751, of the United States Statutes at Large. The grantee has been in possession of said real estate for over three years, to wit, since the delivery of said deed, on the 6th day of January, 1913. She paid the purchase price of $5,000 for said property to the receivers, which was by them paid into court and duly distributed among the creditors of the said insolvent American Union Telephone Co. Unless this bill can receive favorable consideration of Congress the purchaser of this piece of real estate will have no title to the property for which she paid a fair market price. It does not seem just that this purchaser should lose her property because of the mistake made by the court in failing to conform to the provisions of the statute which required that the sale of said property should be made at public sale.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4190) authorizing the Yankton County Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr., and I submit a report (No. 219) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS FLINT RIVER, GA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9225) granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties, and I submit a report (No. 218) thereon. I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUND OF EXCESS IMPORT DUTIES.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably the bill (S. 4398) for the refund of excess duties on steel blooms, and I submit a report (No. 220) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Walston H. Brown, sole surviving partner of the firm of Brown, Howard & Co., the sum of $65,792.53; Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. the sum of $26,400.30; and the estate of Henry A. V. Post, deceased, the sum of $50,359.35, as a refund of import duties paid in excess of the duties imposed by law on steel blooms, as found by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF AVIATION SERVICE.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the morning business ought first to be concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is next in order.

RENEWAL OF PATENT.

Mr. CLAPP. On the 3d instant I introduced the bill (S. 4820) to permanently renew patent No. 21053, and it was referred to the Committee on Patents. I ask that the Committee on Patents be discharged from further consideration of the bill and that it be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CLAPP. I now introduce a new bill to permanently renew patent No. 21053, which I ask may be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

The bill (S. 4889) to permanently renew patent No. 21053 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $24,649.57 for paving streets in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., fronting on Government property used in connection with the ship canal, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $125 to pay H. G. Lorimer for fees and expenses as an expert witness on behalf of the Government in the case of the United States v. Henry Samuels tried in the District Court of the United States for the District of Kansas, second division, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (by request) submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3929) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 119), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Fisheries, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

THE AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 120), which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas an act to provide for the removal of what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge across the Potomac River and the building of a new bridge in place thereof is now pending; and

Whereas the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a bridge across the Potomac River at or near what is now known as the Aqueduct Bridge, replacing said bridge with a substantial structure at a cost of not more than $1,000,000; and

Whereas it does not appear that the Secretary of War has been requested to furnish Congress with any opinion as to the proper or suitable place to construct said bridge: Now, therefore

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, requested to report what, if any, request has been made by any committee of Congress for his opinion as to a suitable and proper location and, if so, his answer thereto; and

Resolved further, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to the Senate what, in his opinion, would be a proper and suitable location for such structure, taking into consideration the military necessities and requirements of the Government and the business interest of the District of Columbia.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 123), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CLAIM OF EMMETTA HUMPHREYS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 122), which was read and referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims is hereby requested and directed to consider and report upon the claim of Emmetta Humphreys, administratrix de bonis non of John Sevier, sr., and John Sevier, jr., against the United States, and to advise the Senate what amount, if any, should be paid said administratrix in view of the findings of the Court of Claims, as set out in House Document No. 1302, Sixty-second Congress, third session.

CAROLINE L. RIFENBERG.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 121), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Caroline L. Rifenberg, widow of Sherman Rifenberg, late a laborer in heating department, United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

RURAL CREDITS (S. DOC. NO. 349).

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that there may be printed as a public document a statement made by Grant S. Youmans, of Minot, N. Dak., special legislative representative of the members of the North Dakota State Union of the American Society of Equity and all of its affiliated farm organizations, pertaining to rural-credits bills. The testimony taken in the House has not been printed, and as this relates to the subject and gives the views of the farmer organizations of my State I ask that it may be printed as a public document, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SPEECH BY EX-GOV. GLYNN, OF NEW YORK.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech recently delivered by ex-Gov. Glynn, of New York, regarding the current political questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

The speech referred to is as follows:

REPLY OF FORMER GOV. MARTIN H. GLYNN, CHAIRMAN OF THE DEMOCRATIC STATE CONFERENCE AT SYRACUSE, MARCH 1, 1916, TO FORMER SENATOR ELIHU ROOT, CHAIRMAN OF THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONFERENCE AT CARNEGIE HALL, "WHEN THE SHIP OF STATE IS ROCKED AND TOSSED BY ANGRY WAVES AND HOWLING WINDS, THE PASSENGERS MAY LOSE THEIR HEADS, BUT THE CAPTAIN WILL KEEP HIS."

"Fellow Democrats and gentlemen of the conference, we assemble here under conditions which it has not been given to any of our predecessors to share. Outside the American Continent the whole world is plunged into war, with all its horrors, famine, suffering, grief, desolation spread over civilized Europe. Family ties, which spell joy and happiness in life and render the struggle for existence bearable, have been ruthlessly destroyed within the bounds of the warring nations, and yet we are able, though with sadness, to look upon this horrible spectacle from the confines of a nation absolutely at peace with the world—a nation that is more prosperous than at any time in its history, and a nation whose people enjoy more of liberty and of opportunity and of happiness than has ever been known in the history of mankind. We occupy this wonderful position of peace and prosperity not because of any accident but because of the wise and careful and successful policy of those in charge of our National Government. At any time during the progress of the European war the slightest error in judgment or mistake in action might have plunged us into the same conflict which is now impoverishing the nations of Europe. Our people fully sensing what this condition means to them are standing loyally behind President Wilson in his efforts to maintain peace, and are united in supporting the measures which he proposes to defend this country from any aggression in the future and so perpetuate for all time the peace which the European war has shown means so much to us as a nation and as individuals.

SEA OF NEUTRALITY.

"On the sea of neutrality President Wilson has had to sail a hard and dangerous course as captain of our ship of state, but he has sailed it bravely and well. No other pilot of the Nation since Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln has had to sail a sea so beset with storms and floating mines. The old charts have been torn up, the lighthouses extinguished by the belligerent nations throwing international law to the winds, but Pilot Wilson insists upon sailing the old course according to the old maps. Great Britain, Germany, and France may interpret international law each day to suit their whims and needs, but America persists in interpreting it with justice, with reason, and with national dignity. If we were to fight foreign nations for a violation of international law, as Mr. Root insinuates, we would fight not only Germany, as Mr. Root seems to imagine, but also every other nation participating in Europe's carnival of woe. Mr. Root's policy would make the United States a whirling dervish of war and send us into a perpetual dance of death. Mr. Root would make the United States the policeman of the world, but the teachings of Washington and Jefferson and Franklin about the avoidance of entangling alliances with foreign nations forbid the United States from attempting any such fantastic rôle. Rome tried to be policeman of the world and went down; Portugal tried to be policeman of the world and went down; Spain tried and went down; Napoleon tried and went down, and the United States proposes to profit by the experience of the ages and not attempt a policy that would surely turn into a Frankenstein to destroy us.

WHERE WILL IT END?

"If we start this policy, where are we to stop? There is no stopping. It is a vicious circle leading to destruction. It would mean a reversal of our traditional policy of government. It would mean the adoption of imperialistic doctrines, which we have denounced for over a century. It would make all other nations the wards of the United States and the United States the keeper of the world. We would be so busy settling other people's quarrels that we would have no time to attend to our own business. It would make the United States either the bully of creation or else a 'globe-trotting, earth-perambulating missionary of good government all over the world.' It is founded on no reasonable principle. What becomes of the Monroe doctrine under such a policy? How long do you suppose we would be allowed to meddle in European affairs while denying Europe the right to meddle in American affairs? The policy is a dream; it never could be a possibility. It was not even advanced in good faith; it is simply an appeal to passion and pride, to sympathy and prejudice, to secure partisan advantage.

"Under the stress of war international law has been battered out of recognition. As the devil quotes the Bible to suit his own purpose, so the warring nations quote documentary international law to suit their own course, without regard to the existence of neutrals, the rights of neutrals, or the trade of neutrals. Mr. Root says that Germany does this. He fails to say that the other warring nations also do it. Germany brands the seizure of provision ships as a violation of international law, adopts a policy of reprisal, and promises reparation under a treaty that has nothing to do with the case. England ruled the question of maritime law in war time out of The Hague conference in 1898 and failed to adopt the London declaration of 1911. But when war breaks out England says she will stand by the declaration of London. No sooner said, though, than she modifies the list of contraband, and no sooner modifies it than she alters it again, and then rejects the whole theory of contraband by proposing to seize all vessels bound for the enemies' ports or carrying cargoes ultimately destined for the enemies' territory. Between shifting winds from every side, between varying currents all about, America is thus caught in the maelstrom of war. The problem is the same which Washington had, and Jefferson had, and Adams had, and Lincoln had, and Woodrow Wilson is treating it as Washington treated it, as Jefferson treated it, as Adams treated it, and as Lincoln treated it.

"HONOR BY PEACE IF WE CAN, BY WAR IF WE MUST."

"'To maintain our national honor by peace if we can, but by war if we must,' is the motto of Woodrow Wilson. But before submitting to the chance and misery of war, true statesman that he is, he proposed to put the reason and justice of negotiation to the test. Just as Horace Greeley criticized the form of Lincoln's negotiations, just as Alexander Hamilton and Rufus King criticized the form of the Genet negotiations when Washington was President, just as the members of John Adams's own Cabinet criticized his negotiations in averting war with France, just as John Randolph criticized the form of Jefferson's negotiations with France, and just as fanatics condemned Lincoln for overruling his Secretary of the Navy and even the House of Representatives in the Trent affair with England, just so for personal and political purposes men of Elihu Root's stamp criticize Mr. Wilson's policies.

IN DIPLOMACY FORM IS SECONDARY, RESULT PRIMARY.

"There never was penned an important diplomatic document that was not criticized by some one, because phraseology is largely a matter of education, taste, and temperament. In diplomacy form is secondary, result is primary. Form is a matter of opinion; result is fact. And what is the result of the form of Mr. Wilson's diplomatic negotiations with the warring nations of Europe? Why, simply this: While Europe is drenched in the blood of a sinister war, we are enjoying the blessings of an honorable peace. The men in society's salons, lettered dilettantes in libraries, and swaggering devotees of fashion who would fight our battles on the carpet of parlor trenches, in the restaurants of clubs, or amid the dangers of afternoon teas, may be primarily interested in the form of our diplomatic negotiations. But the men who must fight our battles where the cannon roars and the bullets sing and death stalks—also their wives, their sons, their daughters, and their mothers—these are primarily interested in the result of our negotiations and not in the form. And the men who would do the fighting stand where Woodrow Wilson stands. Their motto is, 'We will maintain our national honor by peace if we can, but by war if we must.' For this reason Woodrow Wilson, with malice toward no nation, with justice for this Nation, and with sympathy for all nations, champions and will continue to champion the policy that the United States stands upon its unassailable right to be a neutral nation and to act as a neutral nation though—

"The heathen rage and the people imagine a vain thing. The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take council together.

FOLLOWING GEN. GRANT.

"Mr. Root says this policy has satisfied no one. Mr. Root means that it has satisfied no one who is a partisan in this conflict. The very fact that it may not have satisfied partisans is a proof of its neutrality, a proof of its success, for in a vital war like this neither side is satisfied with justice unless it can tamper with the scales. But Mr. Root forgets that in this strife most Americans are neutral and as neutrals approve of Woodrow Wilson following the policy that the founders and the saviors of this country followed in somewhat similar circumstances. The policy of Abraham Lincoln in the sixties demanded neutrality, and this is the policy of Woodrow Wilson to-day. Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Lincoln insisted that the United States had a sovereign national right to stay out of war just as much as to go into war, and so does Woodrow Wilson. Gen. Grant said there never was a war that could not have been settled better some other way, and the people of this country are in favor of taking Grant's advice and trying the other way before trying war.

DOMESTIC TO THE FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

"So palpably successful has been the domestic policy of the Wilson administration that our opponents are able to find few loopholes for assault. Our foreign policy the prominent leaders of the opposition have repeatedly indorsed during the past few months, but now on the eve of a presidential election they suddenly turn front and treacherously attack. Their challenge we gladly accept, confident that a fair-minded American public will uphold the honorable, patriotic, and highly American policy which the Democratic Party has pursued, beset by difficulties, hampered by conditions for which the Republican Party is responsible, and surrounded by pitfalls on every side, wherein a single misstep would have hurled this country to disaster and to woe. Others may make expediency the star of their course in foreign affairs, but we follow the star of justice. Others for vainglory or for selfish purpose may cry up a policy of 'blood and iron,' but we contend that in the long run true humanity is true statesmanship, and true statesmanship true humanity.

NATIONAL HONOR.

"Mr. Root talks of 'national honor' as if by some divine commission he had been appointed the keeper and interpreter of the honor of the Nation. Now, real honor and real dishonor can be felt and are felt even by the lowliest toiler in the land as acutely and as accurately as by even Mr. Root. Instinct serves better here than legal speculation or metaphysical distinction. The man in the street, the toiler in the fields, the artisan in the shops, the man who shoulders his musket and marches away at his country's call needs no lawyer, no statesman, no interpreter to tell him when the honor of his Nation is outraged or the glory of his flag is sullied. It is an elemental instinct which knows without knowing why. It is an elemental instinct which enables even the unschooled to know right from wrong, justice from injustice, principle from prejudice, passion from reason. When the honor of our country is outraged and the glory of our flag sullied the people will know it without Mr. Root or anyone else telling them. If such an insult ever comes to this country, the great mass of the people who will have to do the fighting will not have to be called to war. They will call themselves to war. They will rally around the Stars and Stripes as their fathers rallied at Lexington and Concord, at Saratoga, and at Yorktown and a hundred other battle fields, and they will rally with the blessing and the prayers of those left at home sorrowing in anxiety, but exulting in self-sacrifice to preserve our honor and to glorify our flag.

WAR DRUMS AND WAR DRUMMERS.

"For a man who has signed more arbitration treaties than any other man in the country save one, Mr. Root's warlike speech is a mysterious performance. He is about the last man in the land from whom the country had a right to expect it.

"For years Mr. Root has been the star performer at peace conferences, and yet he condemns President Wilson for maintaining peace. Mr. Root may forget, but Woodrow Wilson remembers, that the leader of a nation who plunges his people into an unnecessary war vainly washes his hands of innocent blood, like Pontius Pilate, while the earth quakes and the heavens are darkened and thousands give up the ghost.

MR. ROOT BECOMES A DRUM AND TRUMPET STATESMAN—TRANSFORMS HIMSELF FROM A LOVING DOVE OF PEACE TO A SWOOPING HAWK OF WAR—ALSO MR. LODGE.

"For years Mr. Root has been acclaimed an apostle of peace, and in 1912 was awarded the Nobel prize for the promotion of peace, but now he sallies forth as a drum and trumpet statesman.

"From a cooing dove of peace Mr. Root suddenly transforms himself into a swooping hawk of war.

"Years ago enthusiasts in Bohemia took the skin of John Ziska, the patriot, and stretched it as a drumhead to rouse their followers to war. So to-day Elihu Root would stretch the skins of the victims of the Lusitania, the skins of the victims of the Belgian invasion, into a drumhead to rouse the kindly sentiment of sympathy into the frenzied craze of war.

"Mr. Root may beat his drum and blare his trumpet, but President Wilson will go right on winning the plaudits of the American people by appealing to reason, humanity, and common sense and by keeping the United States the uncompromising champion of the neutral world and the undaunted maintainer of the principles which have guided this Nation since 1776.

"And what a glorious rôle is this; what a badge of honor the neutral nations wear to-day! Upon the neutral nations depend the salvation of justice, the preservation of moral balances, and the conservation of the natural energies which will be needed to set this world aright when the present cataclysm is over.

"Our opponents say that Mr. Root's speech is not a declaration for war; but hardly have its echoes died upon the air before Senator LODGE, the other great spokesman of the Republican Party, makes a speech at Washington, in which, between the lines, he glorifies the purple testament of bleeding war and minimizes the grandeur of peace. If Senator LODGE is right, Washington and the other leaders of this Nation were like Achilles, who "fed on bears' marrow and lions' hearts." But Senator LODGE is not right. James Bryce, one of the greatest living historians, says so. In his American Commonwealth James Bryce says that Washington and his fellows were no sanguinary lords of war. Senator LODGE is not right, and this we can prove by the words of Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Benjamin Franklin.

"Thomas Jefferson says, 'I recoil with horror at the ferociousness of men,' and then he calls upon nations 'to devise a more rational umpire of differences than force.' He says, 'War is an instrument entirely inefficient toward redressing wrongs, and it multiplies instead of indemnifying losses.' Benjamin Franklin says, 'There is one improvement I wish to see in moral philosophy—the discovery of a plan which would induce and oblige nations to settle their disputes without first cutting one another's throats,' and then he says that in his opinion 'there never was a good war or a bad peace.' In 1785 Washington wrote to David Humphrey, 'My first wish is to see war, the plague of mankind, banished from the earth.' To Lafayette, Washington wrote, 'It is really a strange thing that there should not be room enough in the world for men to live without cutting one another's throats,' and in his Farewell Address he expressed the hope 'that we may never unsheath the sword except in self-defense, so long as justice and our essential rights and national respectability can be preserved without it.' And upon that declaration the Democratic Party stands to-day. Until self-defense and essential rights and national respectability require us to unsheath the sword we are for peace, but when national respectability, essential rights, justice, and self-defense require it we are for war and war to the hilt.

"But, say our opponents, the doctrines of Washington, Jefferson, and Franklin are so old they are dead. Well, if they are dead, how comes it that Mr. Root, as Secretary of State, handed these doctrines to our representatives at The Hague as the lamp to guide their feet and light their way?

"Both Mr. Root and Senator LODGE say they do not plead for war, and yet they plead to passions which cause war, and when you plead for a cause you plead for its effect. Senator LODGE and Mr. Root are both like the craven army drummer who, when captured on the field of battle, begged for release, because he was not a soldier and did not fight, but his captors declared that he should be treated with more severity than an ordinary soldier because the beating of his drum inflamed his followers to carnage. Unless I am mistaken, the American people to-day look at the present moment upon Senator LODGE and Mr. Root as his captors looked upon that caviling drummer.

CHANGE OF MIND.

"Mr. Root finds fault with President Wilson for changing his mind. All men, including Mr. Root, change their minds now and then. If they did not, life would be stagnation instead of progression.

"The instructions which Mr. Root as Secretary of State handed to our representatives at The Hague and his words at Carnegie Hall on Belgium show that Mr. Root sometimes changes his mind. The expressions of Mr. Root at Carnegie Hall on Mexico, compared with his speeches on our relations with the southern Republics during his South American tour as Secretary of State, again show that Mr. Root sometimes changes his mind. Even Mr. Roosevelt sometimes changes his mind. He once thought Mr. Root the only one of his kind, but when they broke he still thought Mr. Root the only one of his kind, but quite another kind.

"But in this Mr. Root and Mr. Roosevelt and President Wilson keep good company.

"In 1775 George Washington was opposed to a war for independence; in 1776 he said that a war for independence was the only thing that could save us. Benjamin Franklin thought we should not come to terms of peace with England in the Revolutionary War unless we got Canada, but he changed his mind before the treaty was signed. When Thomas Jefferson bought the Louisiana tract he reversed the position he formerly maintained as a strict constructionist of the Constitution. Before he became President Thomas Jefferson was opposed to the use of Federal money for internal improvement, but as President he sent a message to Congress advocating the use of public money to improve our rivers and our harbors. For a long while Abraham Lincoln resisted the idea of the emancipation of the slaves. He revoked the order of some of his generals emancipating slaves within the limits of their command, and he struck from the annual report of his Secretary of War a paragraph advocating the adoption of this policy. Yet when the need was pressing and the hour ripe Abraham Lincoln did issue the emancipation proclamation. These examples may have no direct bearing upon the issues of the hour, but they do show the pettiness of criticism running through Mr. Root's speech.

PRESIDENT WILSON FOLLOWS THE PRECEDENTS OF THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND BEST-BELOVED MEN WHO HAVE EVER OCCUPIED THE PRESIDENTIAL CHAIR.

"President Wilson has only shaken his finger; when he has to shake his fist the world will find it mailed.

"Mr. Root says no man should draw a pistol who dares not shoot, and that a government should not shake its fist first and its finger afterwards. Like most epigrams containing the wisdom of the world in capsule form, these epigrams are partly true and partly false. Many a fight with a bully has been averted by shaking first the fist of strength and then pointing the finger of reason; many a necessity for shooting has been averted by pulling a pistol. The experiences of everyday life and the history of diplomacy disclose these truths.

"But if Mr. Root means to apply these epigrams to President Wilson he has made an unhappy application of his trick of speech. President Wilson has only shaken his finger thus far; if necessity compels, though, he can shake his fist and the world will find it mailed. Despite Mr. Root's glittering epigrams, President Wilson is following and will continue to follow the policy pursued under similar circumstances by the most illustrious and the most beloved men who ever occupied the presidential chair.

"The President stands where George Washington stood in 1793, when England in the war with France seized and held hundreds of vessels floating the Stars and Stripes. He prepared for war—he built warships; he erected forts—but he did not shoot. He settled our differences with England by negotiation, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day. And here parenthetically let me remark that, while Secretary of State, Elihu Root in a speech in Argentina practically repeated the great sentiment of Charles Sumner—'Washington upholding the peaceful neutrality of this country while he met unmoved the clamor of the people wickedly crying for war is a greater man than Washington crossing the Delaware or taking Cornwallis's sword at Yorktown.' Yet Mr. Root condemns President Wilson for the very policy for which he praised George Washington. Verily, Elihu Root agrees with the man who said, "Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds." President Wilson stands where John Adams stood in 1799, in our dispute with France. He prepared for war—he created the Navy Department; he built 12 new warships; he brought Washington out of retirement from Mount Vernon to lead the Army—but he didn't shoot. He settled our differences with France by negotiation, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day. The President stands where Abraham Lincoln stood during the Civil War in our dispute with England over the Alabama and other privateers which destroyed a hundred million dollars' worth of our commerce. Through his Secretary of State he threatened England; he listened to all the talk of the House of Representatives for war and the clamor of the country—but he didn't shoot. He initiated the policy that Grant finished, which settled our differences with England by negotiation, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day. The President stands where President Grant stood in our controversy with Spain in 1873, when Spain seized the ship Virginius, flying the American flag, and shot 50 Americans—the captain of the ship, 36 of the crew, and 12 passengers. Grant prepared for war; he authorized the putting of the Navy on a war footing—but he didn't shoot. He settled our difficulties with Spain by negotiations, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day. The President stands where James G. Blaine, Secretary of State, stood in the controversy with Chile for shooting the sailors of the U. S. battleship Baltimore; where Grover Cleveland stood in our controversy with England over Venezuela in 1895—they made preparations for war—but they didn't shoot. They settled our difficulties by negotiations, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day.

"Jefferson settled our maritime troubles with France by negotiations, and as a result won the Louisiana tract for a song. We settled our dispute with England about our northeastern boundary line by negotiation, and Daniel Webster pronounced this negotiation a boon to mankind. Though we conducted the presidential campaign of 1844 on the issue of 'Fifty-four forty or fight,' we didn't fight; we settled the Oregon dispute with England by negotiation, just as Woodrow Wilson is trying to do to-day. And so the record stands that the United States has won more victories by the pen than it ever won by the sword.

LEST WE FORGET THE WORDS THAT MADE US FREE.

"Mr. Root may talk in epigrams all he pleases, but it is cowardly for him to hide himself in a cloud of verbal dust. If Mr. Root believes—despite the example of Washington and Jefferson, Lincoln and Grant—that the United States should go to war for every violation of international law, why doesn't he say so like a man? If he desires to make the United States the brandisher of the 'big stick' in the face of all the world, he should make his position clear. The United States has not yet drawn a pistol, has not yet shaken its fist. It has expressed disapproval and it has appealed to reason and to law. It has placed itself on record in a way that can not be mistaken, but it has not yet taken the irrevocable step; it has not yet appealed to force.

"Would the Republican Party reverse this order? Would the Republican Party shoot first and protest afterwards? Would the Republican Party write its disapproval first in blood and then in ink? Is this the Republican notion of the duty of a Republic which boasts of the brotherhood of man? Mr. Root truly declared that the American people have 'embodied their principles of government in fixed rules of right conduct.'

"If Mr. Root will turn to the Declaration of Independence, he will find a reminder that this is a country which resorts to war only after every other form of redress has failed.

"He will find that before the American Colonies drew the pistol they 'warned,' 'reminded,' 'appealed,' and 'conjured' the British Government 'to disavow' the usurpation of which they complained. Then, as now, a race of freemen claimed the right to be patient, and now, as then, a race of freemen will not falter in a final appeal to arms should their patience be exhausted and all other means of asserting their rights be in vain. As a Nation we deprecate the waste, the horror, the unreason of war, because we are masters of our own destiny. We do not desire to seek that destiny, unless we must, over the bodies of our youth and the tears and lamentations of desolated homes. Because each American knows that his country represents the highest hopes of all mankind, because he knows that his country's flag stands for justice, for opportunity, for reason, and for liberty, he holds himself ever ready to rally to that flag, to lay down his life if need be in defense of the Republic.

"No other land must ever mistake this fundamental truth.

"No other land should ever mistake our unwillingness to seek war for unreadiness to sacrifice life and all that life holds dear to preserve the glory and the integrity and honor of the United States.

"And just as President Wilson observes the truest spirit of America in appealing to reason before he appeals to force, so he now reflects the temper of the Republic in making ready for an appeal to arms should diplomacy become useless and reason without avail.

LUSITANIA.

"For a statesman who had long enjoyed a reputation for poise and balance Mr. Root's attitude on the Lusitania issue is amazing and inexplicable. He claims that if the Lusitania notes meant anything they meant that action was forthcoming, and he concludes that the correspondence is now approaching its end without securing even that partial protection which is desirable for the future. He ignores what has been accomplished. He overlooks that assurances for the future have been given and that reparation for the past has been assured. If he had before him the proposals made by Germany a week before his speech, would Mr. Root, as Secretary of State, have dared go before the country and say that they should not be accepted, and that we must enter an armed conflict over a matter of mere words? As Secretary of State, Mr. Root would not have dared to do so, and as ex-Secretary of State a proper appreciation of the true equation of things should have prompted him to keep his tongue in consonance with the proprieties. Furthermore, Mr. Root, even as a distinguished citizen suddenly turned political incendiary, would not, in view of the note on the Lusitania which the German ambassador handed Secretary of State Lansing on Monday last, dare to repeat on this platform to-night the inflammatory language he lately used in Carnegie Hall.

MR. ROOT AND THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE CONSERVATISM OF RESPONSIBILITY AND THE ANARCHY OF SPEECH.

"Again, the difference between Mr. Root's actions and Mr. Root's words illustrate the difference between the conservatism of responsibility and the anarchy of speech. Since leaving public office Mr. Root seems to have lost the sense of responsibility which officials of Government should feel and which should guide their every act. He states that our first Lusitania note was conceived in events which marked them as impotent. One of these events, he states, was the alleged intimation to the Austrian ambassador by Mr. Bryan that the note of February 10, 1915, was intended for American consumption. Mr. Root accepted a sensational story as the truth, which he could easily have disproved by reference to the Department of State. The fact is the Austrian ambassador agreed with Mr. Bryan that no such statement or intimation had been made to him, and he sent a message to his Government to that effect. Mr. Root, moreover, is doing an unprecedented thing for an ex-Senator of the United States, an ex-Secretary of War, and an ex-Secretary of State when he endeavors to make political capital in a speech before a political convention out of not only foreign relations of the United States, which he well understands are in a critical stage, but out of pending diplomatic negotiations in what is probably the most important case that has been before the State Department since Lincoln's day. He states that it should have been foreseen that cases of this nature were likely to arise, and that American lives would be worthless unless power was maintained. He points to Switzerland and Holland as countries which are properly defended in their rights by organizations and other measures, and states that, 'Nobody has run over them, because they have made it apparent that the cost would be too great.' He does not mention, although he must have read it in the press, that Dutch ships have been sunk by submarines, that Dutch passengers and sailors have lost their lives from such belligerent action, and that Dutch ships are constantly being violated in British waters, and Dutch mail to the United States, including diplomatic pouches, are being removed from them. He does not mention the fact that, though Switzerland is mobilized, she is allowed to continue her manufacture of certain articles only at the sufferance of belligerents on both sides, who portion off exports from this mountain country and imports into it with the minutest care. Brass is furnished by the allies for the manufacture of various articles and Switzerland is held to strict account for every pound. Germany supplies Switzerland with aluminum, steel, zinc, and coal and compels a return in machinery and parts.

"It is easy to say that things 'should have been foreseen,' but foresight is not so common an attribute. Mr. Root, I am informed, approved the American notes on the Lusitania case, but said nothing at the time about preparation for action in case America's demands were not complied with.

"Mr. Root would have had our Government protest in regard to the invasion of Belgium, and if in the case of Belgium, certainly he would have had this Government continue to protest all the numberless violations of international law by all the belligerents, no matter whether the violations were against this country or another. Such a course would have been futile, would have amounted to nothing, and made us ridiculous in the eyes of the world. And these protests Mr. Root would have backed by force if he were to be true to his position. Mr. Root's course would surely 'lead us into inevitable war'—just as he says our present course will. The violation of international law, in regard to which Mr. Root would have this Government make its attitude clear and enforce its demands, occurred within a few months after the war opened and before it was possible to make sufficient preparation, which he says has been neglected by the present administration. Preparation to back up a policy such as Mr. Root has outlined should have been begun years ago by administrations of which Mr. Root was the moving spirit. All the world has known that for years prior to the beginning of the present war the nations of Europe had been preparing great armaments. During that time Mr. Root was Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and United States Senator. 'Ordinary practical sense in the conduct of affairs,' using the words of Mr. Root, should have taught him and his associates the necessity of voting large amounts for suitable preparation against the outbreak of such a war. Does it therefore become Mr. Root to criticize the President and the administration for not enforcing its demands when previous administrations with which he was intimately connected failed to use ordinary foresight in laying the foundation for suitable military and naval forces? He appears to forget in his suggestion of an aggressive policy that the countries now at war are the great nations of the earth, fully equipped and armed, conscious of their strength and their position in the family of nations, which will not brook the domineering tactics of another nation. Moreover, in this great war the participants are wrought up to a state of excitement which must not be lost sight of in dealing with international situations which arise. While a breach of diplomatic relations might be regarded in ordinary times as not leading to war, such action at the present time with any of the belligerents would inevitably lead to an armed conflict.

TRUE PRIDE.

"In this phase of the question Mr. Root undervalues but the world holds in proper place a true pride in all the relations of life.

"There is a pride of national duty which is incapable of sacrificing peace and happiness; there is a pride of high responsibility which forbids an appeal to the sword until all other means have failed; there is a pride in the possession of calm understanding and patient foresight which stands firm against the protest of the partisan and the blood lust of the brute; but the man who disdains to plunge millions of his fellow beings into the dismal abyss of war until he has exhausted every honorable means for peace will never be too weak to guard the honor or the liberties of his country when assailed.

"The man who bravely avoids an unnecessary war will never be too cowardly to wage a just one.

"Mr. Root would make of the President of the United States an incendiary in a world of fire. He would make the Chief Executive a swashbuckler instead of a statesman. He would have the President insist upon the propriety of the duello, while the combatants reel upon the cliffs of national existence. He would have the President forget that while we debate men are dying by thousands across the ocean; that while we are inconvenienced the rest of the world is enduring the agonies of the damned; that while we are sitting quietly by our fireside the rest of the human race is writhing in the torments of the firing line.

"Is it Mr. Root's conception of American honor that we should assert that honor by adding to universal misery? Is it his idea that our national duty is to make no allowance for the naked passions and desperate needs of the white-heat conflict that now inflames and distorts the reason and humanity of Europe? Surely it is not the part of American honor to shut our eyes to the situation of those with whom we are dealing. Surely President Wilson has been true to the highest ideals of America in prolonging negotiations until a people impassioned by war should have time and opportunity to pass calmly upon the justice of America's claims.

BELGIUM.

"The efforts of politicians like Mr. Root to make political capital out of the course which President Wilson deemed it wise for this Nation to follow in respect to Belgium during the early stages of the present war deserve, and will receive, unqualified condemnation and rebuke at the hands of the most right-thinking and patriotic Americans. The horror and sufferings and devastation of this little nation have sunk deep into the American heart.

"No fair-minded man can question the wisdom and integrity of our Belgium policy. To say that it has sullied our honor or besmirched our conscience, as Mr. Root intimates, is an insult to the intelligence of the Nation. On this question Mr. Root quibbles with the genius that has made him famous. He was Secretary of State when The Hague conference of 1907 was held, and from him the American delegates received the instructions to make to the conference a declaration of America's policy, which covered every act and every convention which the American delegates signed. That declaration later on specifically attached by the Senate to the most important of these conventions, and now standing as a part of them, was as follows:

"Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy * * * of any foreign State, nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

"As Secretary of State, Mr. Root himself adopted the same policy in handling the Japanese-Korean situation. When by force and duress, and against the will of the Koreans, Japan placed the Kingdom of Korea under a Japanese protectorate, no protest was lodged against this action, notwithstanding the provisions of an outstanding treaty between Korea and the United States wherein, among other things, it was agreed that if other powers should deal unjustly or oppressively with either party to the treaty the other would use its good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement of the difficulty. Mr. Root was requested by duly accredited representatives of Korea to act under the provisions of this treaty, and he refused on the ground that, Japan having forced a protectorate upon the Koreans, the treaty between the United States and Korea could be no longer enforced. Here we have a distinct recognition by Mr. Root of the principle of international law underlying the Belgium case. It matters little what Mr. Root may say, yet now, with the presidential election coming on, Mr. Root unworthily seeks to disparage the President of the United States for doing in respect to Belgium precisely what he himself had done as a responsible Government officer a few years before in a very similar case, and precisely what he himself would, of course, have done in the case of Belgium if he had been President instead of Mr. Wilson.

It is absurd and preposterous to assert that any of The Hague conventions, or any clause in the convention, nullified this general policy of the United States. The argument that one of The Hague conventions specifically bound us to go to the defense of Belgium is of no weight, because England never ratified it and was not even technically bound by it. The whole world knows that Great Britain entered the war at the earliest possible moment after the Belgium invasion because of another treaty.

"When Mr. Root made his speech his former instructor and leader was on the Atlantic Ocean. This probably enabled Mr. Root to steal Mr. Roosevelt's clothes while he was in swimming and run away with them. Mr. Roosevelt is now condemning President Wilson's Belgium policy, but only a few months ago he praised it. When would Mr. Roosevelt have the Nation take him seriously; now or some months ago?

MR. ROOSEVELT ONCE SPOKE AND WROTE IN FAVOR OF PRESIDENT WILSON'S ATTITUDE ON BELGIUM.

"Four days after the invasion of Belgium the colonel made a speech in New York, in which he said that 'we should be thankful beyond measure' because we are Americans and not at war, and urged support for the administration in securing peace and justice. But he said nothing of any duty to Belgium.

"He discussed at Hartford, Conn., on August 15, 1914, the Bryan peace treaties, but had no whisper for obligations under The Hague treaties. Seven weeks after the Belgian invasion he printed in the Outlook, on September 23, 1914, an elaborate article on the war, with long discussions of its Belgian phases. Here are some of its passages:

"A delegation of Belgians has arrived to invoke our assistance. What action our Government can or will take, I know not.

"It has been assumed that no action can be taken that will interfere with our neutrality. It is certainly eminently desirable that we should remain entirely neutral and nothing but urgent need would warrant breaking our neutrality and taking sides one way or the other.

"Of course, it would be folly to jump into the gulf ourselves to no good purpose, and very probably nothing we could have done would have helped Belgium. We have not the smallest responsibility for what has befallen her, and I am sure that the sympathy of this country for the suffering of the men, women, and children of Belgium is very real.

"Nevertheless, this sympathy is compatible with full acknowledgment of the unwisdom of uttering a single word of official protest unless we are prepared to make that protest effective, and only the clearest and most urgent national duty would ever justify us in deviating from our rule of neutrality and noninterference.

FORMER PRESIDENT TAFT PRAISES THE BELGIUM POLICY OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

"But all the Republicans of the Nation do not condemn President Wilson's Belgium policy. Former President Taft does not. At a speech delivered at Morristown, N. J., Mr. Taft said:

"While I sympathize with the Belgians in this war, whose country, without any fault of theirs, has been made its bloody center, I approve and commend to the full the attitude of President Wilson.

"We are not sitting as judges of issues between countries in Europe in this great war. We are seeking to maintain strict neutrality, and until our decision is involved with an agreement to abide by our judgment and recommendation for settlement, we need not embroil ourselves by official expressions of criticisms or approval of the acts of the participants in the war. This is not only the wisest course for us to pursue in maintaining an attitude that may give us influence in promoting mediation when mediation is possible, but it will help us to avoid being drawn into the war.

"The insincerity of the Republican Party in its Belgium attitude is shown by the words of Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt, and by its record between 1901 and 1909. During those years Mr. Roosevelt was President and Mr. Root in the Cabinet most of the time. In 1903 occurred the massacre at Kishinev and for many years after 1903 Macedonia ran red with blood; in 1905 the horrors of the Kongo were officially published; in 1905 Korea lost its independence; in 1906 Morocco was parceled out by the powers; in 1906 the Russian Government shot, hanged, and massacred thousands of her people; in 1909, 25,000 Armenians were slaughtered at Adana, and yet no note of protest came from the Republican Party seated in the seats of the mighty at Washington. What reason, then, has the Republican Party to expect people to believe that it would have acted any differently in 1914 than it did from 1901 to 1909?

MEXICO.

"A great deal of criticism has been directed against the present administration because of the President's advice to Americans in Mexico to leave that country and return to the United States. As is the case in many matters involving our foreign relations, a great part of this criticism is based upon an incomplete knowledge of the facts and a failure to take into consideration all the phases of the situation. President Wilson's advice to Americans to leave Mexico was not by any means a radical departure from the policy of the previous administration. It was merely an affirmation and reiteration of an apparently well-considered and wholly justifiable position taken by Mr. Taft in 1912, when he advised Americans to withdraw from localities where conditions or prospects of lawlessness threatened the personal safety of Americans and when he directed consular officers to take charge of abandoned effects of American citizens. This advice was applied to practically the entire Republic. This plainly shows, therefore, the opinion of the Taft administration at that time. On November 21, 1910, the commanding general of the Department of Texas was authorized to send troops to the border to enforce the neutrality laws. Additional troops were later sent to patrol the entire border. The War Department early in February, 1912, held all troops in readiness for service along the Mexican border. This created a situation in Mexico which made some of the people doubt the stability of the Madero government, and gave rise to widespread brigandage throughout Mexico. On February 24, 1912, the Washington authorities hinted to the Mexican authorities that military force was contemplated.

"The truth of the matter is, if the Taft administration had given Madero one-tenth part of the support and assistance that this administration is giving the de facto government, President Madero would most assuredly have been successful in establishing peace and order, the alleged crime of Huerta would not have been committed, the loss of American lives and property since that time would not have occurred, and Mexico would have been spared the horrors of the fratricidal war which has since prevailed there.

"On April 15, 1912, the Department of State under President Taft sent what was practically an ultimatum to the Madero government in which intervention was threatened.

"This ultimatum stated that 'until more headway was made in unseating Madero, no interviews could be granted and no communications received from insurgents.'

"It seems that the Taft administration had devoted itself to a campaign of nagging and persecuting the struggling government of Madero. During the early part of September, 1912, President Taft stated to Ambassador Calero that this Government was dissatisfied with internal conditions in Mexico. The newspapers in reporting the matter said:

"Mr. Taft is opposed to intervention except as a last resort. It is admitted, however, that conditions in Mexico have become much worse in the last few weeks, and if the Madero government is unable to check the attacks on American citizens the United States will be constrained to take action.

"So it will be seen that the situation in Mexico when Woodrow Wilson became President was an unfortunate inheritance.

"Mr. Root says it was President Wilson's duty to do the very things which President Taft did not do and for which he fails to condemn President Taft while condemning President Wilson.

"The Taft administration had nagged and persecuted President Madero almost up to the breaking point; it had shifted its troops down to the border for the supposed purpose of protecting its ambassador to Mexico, at a time when such a move weakened and embarrassed the Madero government; it had allowed Americans to be killed in Mexico and American property to be looted and menaced. About 60 Americans are known to have been killed during the Taft administration, and yet Senator Root assumes for his part a 'holier than thou' attitude.

"In view of all the circumstances, the last administration had all the opportunity it could wish for to send an army into Mexico if it had desired to avail itself of the justification which Senator Root is now urging upon this administration.

"Mr. Taft did not believe it wise to sacrifice thousands of lives and millions of dollars in order to intervene in the internal affairs of Mexico.

"President Wilson has found nothing so far which would justify the great sacrifice of human life which would be necessary to obtain military control of Mexico.

"President Wilson's Mexican policy has been born of the belief that no permanency in government would be obtained in Mexico or in any other American Republic so long as this Government was ready to recognize every revolutionist who might secure control.

"President Wilson's Mexican policy is consistent with the American idea that the government of any Republic should be the choice of its people.

"So long as governments created by force and financed from without can control in Mexico, just so long will there be no safety of life or security of property in that country.

"For 50 years we have been talking Pan Americanism, and Pan Americanism has been impossible because the other American Republics have always suspected sinister purposes in our attitude toward them.

"But President Wilson's policy has made every American Republic believe for the first time that our Government has no desire or purpose to take their territory or coerce their Government. Out of this European war no man can tell what will come, but this much is certain that it is vital for the peace and prosperity and honor of the Western Hemisphere that there be a fidelity in the pretensions and an honesty in the relations between the Governments of the American Continent.

"Mr. Root charges that our policy has been vacillating; that the President invaded Mexico and then retreated. The charge is not true. Mr. Root has no evidence upon which to base such an accusation.

"Here is the truth about the Vera Cruz incident: Admiral Mayo was at Tampico. American sailors and officers were insulted by Mexican soldiers. A boat crew and paymaster of the United States Navy were arrested on the wharf at Tampico by Huerta's followers. Without the knowledge and without any instruction from the administration at Washington Admiral Mayo demanded the release of his men, an apology, and a salute to the flag. Huerta's followers did not comply, and the President backed up the demands of our officers. The salute was denied. Vera Cruz was occupied, not for invasion, but to punish an insult to the flag and the Navy. With a loss of 300 men Huerta's band was punished and the incident was closed. The Vera Cruz incident did not have its origin in or any relation to the fixed policy of President Wilson toward Mexico and the other American Republics.

SENATOR ROOT MADE A SPEECH IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE AGAINST OUR INTERVENTION IN MEXICO—TALKS LIKE THERSITES TO-DAY THOUGH YESTERDAY HE ACTED LIKE NESTOR.

"Our opponents say we invaded Vera Cruz to help Carranza and hurt Huerta. They forget that Carranza protested at the landing of United States troops in Vera Cruz. Would Carranza have protested if this charge of our opponents were true?

"On the Mexican question Senator Root again plays the weathercock and veers in the shifting winds of opportunism. What he urged President Wilson to do in Mexico he advised President Taft not to do. And so I say that Senator Root's conduct as an official and his talk as a political agitator illustrate the difference between the conservatism of responsibility and the anarchy of speech. And here is the proof that Mr. Root can blow hot one day and cold the next, can talk like Thersites to-day though yesterday he acted like Nestor.

"When Senator STONE, the present Democratic chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, introduced into the Senate a resolution which would have committed this country to the very Mexican policy which Mr. Root now urges, he rose in the Senate and condemned the effort of the Democrats to do the very thing which he says should have been done, and for want of which he says the Democracy has forfeited the respect of the citizens of this country. Here are the exact words of Mr. Root which expose the somersault he has thrown on the Mexican situation:

"Mr. President, before the subject is passed over and the resolution laid upon the table, I wish to express my entire dissent from the assumption which seemed to me to be carried by the expression of opinion on the part of the Senator from Missouri. Granting that injuries have been done to American citizens which ought to be redressed, that wounds have been inflicted, that lives have been taken, that property has been destroyed, it does not follow, sir, that we should begin the process of securing redress for those injuries by a threat of force on the part of a great and powerful nation against a smaller and weaker nation. That, sir, is to reverse the policy of the United States and to take a step backward in the pathway of civilization.

"There is no reason whatever, sir, to assume, if injuries have been done of the kind described, that the Government of Mexico is unwilling to make due redress upon having those injuries and claims presented to her in the ordinary course of peaceful negotiations; and for redress the passage of such a resolution as has been described, equivalent to a declaration of war, would be to preface the ordinary demand—the demand which it is the duty of every civilized power to make upon a friendly nation—with a threat that if the demand is not complied with force will be used.

"Sympathy with the people of Mexico in their distress, a just sense of the duties that we owe to that friendly people, and the duties that we owe to the peace of the world must forbid our assenting to or yielding to any such course. * * *

"Evidently Mr. Root's opinion as to what should be our Mexican policy shifts from day to day. He is for any policy that at the moment promises the most votes for the Republican Party. Anyway it is a source of consolation to know that as a United States Senator he approved, though as a political agitator he condemns, the policy which President Wilson is following in Mexico.

GREAT NATOINAL LEGISLATION.

"Four years ago the Nation committed its care and welfare to the Democratic Party, and the Democratic Party has been true to the trust. It has preserved peace, promoted prosperity, maintained national honor, observed international laws, and followed the traditions of the fathers of the country.

"No other administration of our age and generation has enacted such a galaxy of laws for the public welfare.

"It passed the Trade Commission bill, which created a tribunal that will arbitrate between disputants in commerce and do justice between the public and the great industrial corporations. It passed the Clayton antitrust law, which does away with interlocking directorates, defines and expands the prohibitions of the Sherman Act, modifies the powers of Federal courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes, and nullifies a multitude of abuses that have been in controversy for years. It consummated the Federal income tax, which makes the fortunes of the rich bear their proportionate part of the burden of taxation and brings into the Federal Treasury over a hundred million dollars a year. It promoted the constitutional amendment which provides for the election of United States Senators by popular vote and frees the United States Senate from possible control by special interests and makes possible the election by the people of their representatives in the Senate at the polls. It repealed the law fixing discriminatory tolls for the Panama Canal, and thereby proclaimed to the world the sacredness of American treaty obligations. It passed the Lever agricultural extension act to help increase the productiveness of American farms. It passed the industrial employees arbitration act, which affords the Government facilities for settling great railway and industrial strikes that threaten to tie up the traffic and upset business of the country. It passed a conservation law, which will develop the water power of the country, facilitate manufacturing, and open avenues of employment. It drove the lobby out of Washington. It prevented railroad strikes which threatened industry and tranquillity. It enforced the antitrust laws always on the ground of justice, never for the purpose of political reward or partisan punishment. It extended the Parcel Post System, and for the first time in history distributed public funds fairly around the country for the purpose of moving crops. It started the application of scientific and modern business methods toward the elimination of waste in the transportation and distribution of farm products. It made the largest appropriation in the history of the country for educational work in the encouragement of rural and industrial education, education in the home, education in civics and principles of citizenship, education of the negroes and immigrants, education in home economics, home and school gardens, and along other practical lines. It has saved a million dollars a year to the old soldiers and their widows through the direct payment of pensions by check. It proposes to make $500,000,000 available for the promotion of agriculture by the establishment of land banks that will build up a system of rural credits for the farmer. It has sent special commissioners to Great Britain, Germany, France, Russia, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, China, Japan, and India to promote our commerce abroad, and it proposes to send one to every other important point in the world.

"And yet Mr. Root, as chairman of the Republican State conference held at Carnegie Hall, says this administration is 'not an administration of force and foresight.'

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

"In reply to this statement, I say that Mr. Root has no 'hindsight' when he says this in the face of the wonderful success which has greeted the workings of the Federal reserve act. When in the United States Senate Mr. Root opposed the passage of this law, which one of the most eminent economists in the world has said will prove of more value to the American people than the building of the Panama Canal. This law is one of the greatest achievements of any administration in the last 50 years. Force and foresight. Why, there never has been a finer exhibition of foresight and statesmanship than that exhibited by the President in insisting upon the passage, at the special session of the Congress in 1913, of the Federal reserve act and opposing, even against the advice of leading men in his party, the adjournment of the Congress after the passage of the tariff act of 1913 until the Federal reserve act was enacted. Subsequent events show that the President was prompted by wondrous economic insight. The Republican Party has had possession of the Government since 1861, with the exception of Mr. Cleveland's two terms. Until Mr. Wilson was inaugurated the Democratic Party had not been in control of the Federal Government for 16 years. During all of that time, and especially during the last 16 years of Republican rule, the necessity for financial legislation in this country was never so great nor so imperative. The Republican Party stands convicted of absolute impotence and incompetence, because it failed utterly to meet the situation. With one of the most complex and difficult problems the Nation has ever had to face, and amid conditions that rendered the task doubly difficult, the President and his party exhibited in a superlative degree the qualities of statesmanship and prescience, and gave the Nation a financial system which, for all time, will confer incalculable benefits upon the American people.

GREATEST BUSINESS LEGISLATION IN 50 YEARS.

"This great piece of legislation not only reestablished beyond the power of impairment that essential confidence upon which alone business could be revived and go forward with safety, but it also provided the enlarged credit facilities for the lack of which the country has suffered for many years, and also gave to these enlarged credit resources the quality of elasticity and automatic responsiveness to the needs of business and enterprise without which it would be impossible for the business of the Nation to expand healthfully and prosperously. Moreover, it put the people of the United States in possession of a financial system which has emancipated them from the control of selfish interests and enables them to go forward with business and enterprise on a safe and assured basis, and provides them with the credit resources to engage in the foreign trade upon a scale limited only by the productive capacity of the country and the enterprise of its people in seeking foreign markets. At last we have the means and the power and the ability to finance our foreign trade. We have never possessed it heretofore under the inelastic and wholly inefficient and unsatisfactory financial system provided by the Republican Party and from which the country has suffered repeated disasters in times past.

PREVENTING A PANIC.

"By reason of this splendid piece of foresight the Democratic Party put the Secretary of the Treasury in possession of such adequate power that he was able to come to the relief of the financial and business interests of the country immediately upon the outbreak of the European war August 1, 1914. The country was saved by the administration from an imminent panic of such stupendous proportions that had it occurred we should have been involved in a terrible disaster from which we would not even yet have been able to recover.

"Immediately after the first declaration of war that forecast the involvement of the whole of Europe, the Secretary of the Treasury announced to the country that there was in the Treasury $500,000,000 of national-bank notes available for immediate issue under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, as amended and made workable by the Federal reserve act. The prominent bankers of the city of New York appealed to the Treasury Department to save them from the threatened calamity, saying that unless measures were taken immediately to relieve the situation the banks of New York would be unable to keep their doors open throughout the day of August 3, 1914. Hesitation meant panic and inaction meant national disaster. The administration met the situation with unhesitating decision and lightning rapidity. In the first week of August, 1914, $100,068,350 of emergency currency was issued under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act as amended and made workable by the Democratic administration, and altogether $386,444,215 of such currency was issued. All of it has since been retired.

"On the morning of the 3d of August, 1914, the Subtreasury in the city of New York was in position to issue and did issue millions of dollars of emergency currency to the banks of New York. The Subtreasury was able to do this because a Democratic administration had the foresight and intelligence to ship from the city of Washington, by express, on the Saturday preceding the 3d of August, 1914, something like $40,000,000 of emergency currency to meet the very crisis the bankers described, and this currency was issued to the New York banks upon the condition that they would pay currency over their counters upon demand not only of their depositors, but of their correspondents throughout the country, so that a currency panic similar to that which befell the country in 1907 through Republican stupidity would not occur again.

"The Democratic administration is fully and legitimately entitled to the credit for saving the people of the United States from the irretrievable disasters threatened by the European war. The President and the Democratic Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury are entitled to all praise for the magnificent statesmanship and foresight with which the business interests of the country and the honor of the country have been protected since the 1st of August, 1914.

"I say, without fear of contradiction, that if it had not been for the Federal reserve act and for the effective work of the administration at Washington the great business prosperity which the country is now enjoying would not have been realized. Contrast this in 1907. That painful experience in American history will always and forever be an indictment of the Republican Party. In a situation which was a zephyr as compared with the 'storm' of August, 1914, all of the Republican machinery of government broke down completely and incalculable loss and disaster overtook the American people. As a matter of fact, the present Democratic prosperity is the only prosperity the American people have enjoyed since the panic of 1907.

"Mr. Root was a part of Mr. Roosevelt's administration in 1907, and shares with Mr. Roosevelt and the leaders of the Republican Party the responsibility for the wholly unnecessary and calamitous happenings of that panic.

MR. ROOT LOST THE "PEACOCK FEATHER" OF A PROPHET BY HIS FATUOUS SPEECH AGAINST THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

"One would assume from Mr. Root's speech that the Republican Party has been infallible and that Mr. Root himself has always acted with infallible judgment upon every occasion. The Federal reserve act is now conceded by everybody to be one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation enacted in this country within the last 50 years at least. As an evidence of Mr. Root's qualities as a statesman and of his foresight and sagacity, I quote from a speech he made in the Senate of the United States on December 13, 1913, denouncing the Federal reserve act:

"I say that this bill presents the financial heresy twice repudiated by the people of the United States. I say that the central reserve board appointed under this bill will have to represent that very heresy. If this bill passes as it stands, America stands to lose all we saved when Grant vetoed the inflation bill, all we saved when Grover Cleveland abolished the silver purchase, all we saved when we elected McKinley, all the Republicans, all the Gold Democrats saved when they helped in the repudiation of the vital principle which has been put into this bill.

"The country has become so deadened by the assaults of sounds, so wearied of discussion, so confused and dazed by complicated figures, that this vital and fateful reversal of the American policy is proceeding with but little attention. But unless all our history of human experience and all the previous judgments—the real judgments—of the American people upon this subject has been wrong, we stand to learn by hard experience what has really been done by the sixteenth section of this currency bill.

"Not a single fundamental of the Federal reserve act as it stands to-day was changed or altered after Mr. Root's speech. This act was passed exactly 10 days later, namely, the 23d of December, 1913, and was approved by the President on the same day. Nearly every Republican in the Senate of the United States and most of them in the House of Representatives voted against the Federal reserve act. If this infallible party and this infallible statesman could not see the value of a great piece of legislation of this character when they had the opportunity to vote for it in the Congress of the United States in 1913, upon what ground can they claim to possess superior wisdom and upon what ground can they ask the American people to confide their destinies to them?

"After such a dismal failure at prophecy, it would seem as if Mr. Root could well afford to refrain from prophecy as to what will be the condition of business in this country when the war in Europe is over, and as to what might have happened in Mexico and Belgium if the United States had acted otherwise than it did. Failure as a prophet in one thing means failure in all. A prophet must never go wrong. Doubt follows a single slip, and with doubt goes the "peacock feather" of the prophet. Mr. Root lost his "peacock feather" as a prophet when he made his fatuous speech against the Federal reserve act.

UNDERWOOD TARIFF—A SPECIAL PLEADER WHO WOULD WIN BY TRUTH IF HE CAN, BUT BY TRICKERY IF HE MUST.

"In the Underwood Tariff Act the Democratic Party gave the Nation the first customs enactment of a generation in which neither lobby nor special interest had a hand. This great measure unfettered industry and commerce and deprived monopoly of its control over production, distribution, and prices. This tariff stimulated American industry and commerce, met public expectations, and redeemed Democratic pledges for a tariff honestly and intelligently written in behalf of all the people. Until the foreign war reduced importations, no tariff ever worked more satisfactorily. Under it, from November, 1913, to June, 1914, the aggregate importations of merchandise were 10 per cent more than in the corresponding period of the preceding year before the present tariff act was passed and the country's bank clearings in the eight months ending June 30, 1914, following the new tariff law were practically equal to the bank clearings of the corresponding period for the preceding year. These figures show Mr. Root's attack upon the present tariff to be mere words. Mr. Root talks about deficits in trade balances, but says not a word about the fact that out of the entire 48 months of the administration of Benjamin Harrison 25 months showed unfavorable trade balances; that 6 out of the 12 months immediately following the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich tariff showed unfavorable trade balances; that at no time in the last 13 years has the favorable balance on merchandise transactions in our foreign trade been as small as it was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, under the Dingley and Payne tariffs; that the favorable balance for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, during 9 months of which the Underwood law prevailed, was nearly $300,000,000 greater than under the corresponding year when the Payne law was in effect; and that if we select 10 months from the passage of the Underwood law until the breaking out of the war and compare them with the like period following the enactment of the Payne law we find a favorable trade balance of over one hundred and fifty millions greater than was the case under the Payne law.

"Comparisons are always odious, but in this case the odium lies on Mr. Root's side.

"The figures of the comparison show that Mr. Root has stretched to a high degree the lawyer's prerogative of suppressing all evidence save evidence of value to his side. But the Democratic Party did not put all its eggs in one basket. It had sense enough to compel, long before the war broke out, the internal revenue to bear its proper share of governmental taxes, and the soundness of this economic principle is now everywhere acknowledged. No man knows better than Mr. Root that in the latter part of 1913 and the early part of 1914 there was an extreme trade depression the world around, even in countries having a high protective tariff and in which no tariff changes had been made. Every student of economic history knows that at that time the whole world suffered from depression and that our share of the depression was both less and less long than the depression of others. It is a surprising and not a very admirable act on the part of Mr. Root, who knows the facts as well as any man alive, to cull a portion and suppress the rest of the facts in a desperate attempt to make the country believe what he wanted it to believe regardless of the truth. Perhaps it is a fault acquired from long practice at the bar and unconsciously indulged. In a vital question like this, though, the country has a right to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; he who gives it less is a special pleader who would win by truth if he can, but by trickery if he must.

PREPAREDNESS.

"Our opponents claim the Republican Party is the friend of military preparedness. But Grover Cleveland and William C.

Whitney started our Navy on whatever ascendency it enjoys to-day, and Samuel J. Tilden is the father of our present system of coast defense. The truth of the matter is that Theodore Roosevelt as President and Elihu Root as Secretary of War cut down the authorized enlisted strength of the United States Army.

"In 1906 President Roosevelt declared in his message to Congress that the Navy should not be enlarged, that it was adequate for our national purposes, and if existing warships were replaced as they were abandoned all our needs would be met. In 1908 Germany began its new naval program which gave its navy a superiority over ours, and from that time till the present the ratio of superiority of the German Navy has been continuously maintained. This is the preparedness that the Republican Party enforced and is the policy which is directly responsible for our present condition and is far different from the preparedness for what the Republican Party claims credit to-day.

"If during all the years it had been in power the Republican Party had adopted a definite and gradual program for the increase of the Army and Navy the defensive strength of the country would be what it ought to be to-day.

"Former Secretary of the Navy George von L. Meyer was in charge of the Navy for four years under the Taft administration, and he is strong in his denunciation of President Wilson's administration of the Navy Department. Yet, compared to what the Wilson administration has done for the Navy, Mr. Meyer did very little. The four years that Mr. Meyer was at the head of the Navy he obtained six battleships. In the first two years of the Wilson administration five battleships were authorized and authorized before the European war began. In his whole four years Mr. Meyer obtained $115,000,000 for the increase of the Navy, while in two years the Wilson administration obtained $87,000,000, and obtained this authorization before the European war began.

"In his recent trip through the West President Wilson made clear his policy on military and naval preparation, and this policy, we submit, is entitled to the fullest approval from men with the welfare of the country at heart, no matter whether they live on the coast or in the interior part of the country and no matter to what political party they may happen to belong.

"Changed conditions brought about by the European war have changed opinions on preparedness. Mr. Roosevelt, including others, has been obliged to change his mind. At the beginning of the Fifty-seventh Congress President Roosevelt in his annual message to Congress said: 'It is not necessary to increase our Army beyond its size at this time,' but he now recognizes changed conditions and has changed his mind.

"At the beginning of the present session of Congress President Wilson, appreciating these new conditions and doubtless with information not entirely given to the public and probably not advisable to be given, presented a reasonable and practical plan for such a state of preparedness as present conditions seem to demand, and he has taken occasion to impress upon the people the necessity for action by Congress on the plans so carefully outlined by his experts. In his speech in New York he said: 'Americans would not seek a contest or cravenly avoid one. They would fight for the vindication of their honor and character, for liberty, and for free institutions.' Thus does President Wilson 'point out the way, the straight, sure road that leads out of the fool paradise to the firm ground of armed readiness, where we shall know no fear and be equal to defending our own.' At St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago, and other places the President's plea was, 'Speed up preparedness legislation.' He did not insist on the precise program presented by his experts who have had the matter in hand. What he wanted and what he wants is a system of preparedness that will best serve the people and put the country in the best possible position to resist attack by sea and land. At Chicago the President said: 'The Army as at present constituted is not large enough for time of peace.' At Des Moines he said: 'I want to tell you that the men who say that we should prepare and prepare immediately are telling you the sober truth. I think you will agree that no one is in a position to know the truth better than I.' In Kansas City he said: 'Speaking with all solemnity I assure you there is not a day to be lost.'

PLACING THE BLAME WHERE IT BELONGS.

"In his declaration that we are unprepared for war, Mr. Root alludes to President Wilson's strenuous efforts to secure adequate defenses, and holding up his hands in mock horror exclaims, 'God grant he be not too late.'

"If he be too late, upon whom should the blame fall? Upon Mr. Wilson, who has been President for two years, or upon the leaders of the Republican Party who controlled the military and naval policy of this country for 20 years? And among those leaders responsible for the present unprepared condition of the country must be included Mr. Root, for years at the head of the military department of this Government. Upon whom should the blame fall? Upon the Democratic Party, whose responsibility is only two years old, or upon the Republican Party, who has controlled the destinies of this Nation for 40 out of the last 50 years?

"The Democratic Party is for a policy of preparedness just as Tilden was, just as Whitney was, just as Cleveland was, but for a policy of preparedness for the benefit of the Nation, not for the benefit of stockjobbers, money lenders, steel makers, or munition manufacturers. The Democratic Party is for enough preparedness to man the walls of the Nation and to sail the seas with honor, but the Democratic Party is for so much preparedness as will insure the serenity of defense and the impossibility of invasion; but the Democratic Party is not for so much preparedness as will beget the insolence of offense or the mania of aggression.

WILL HOLD HIS RUDDER TRUE.

"History repeats itself historians say. In the annals of old there is a story of a ship caught at sea in a storm which raged as if the very heavens were at war. Havoc threatened on every side, confusion beckoned, and nature seemed to be out of joint, but to the elements in their wildest fury the captain of the ship calmly said:

"'You may sink me, you may save me, but I'll hold my rudder true.'

"So to-day the American people, hot-heads and cool heads, partisans, and neutrals—whether they follow wisdom or coax on fury—Woodrow Wilson says by his deeds, not by words:

"'You may sink me, you may save me, but I'll hold my rudder true.'

ON THE RED-LEAVED TABLETS OF GRATEFUL HUMAN HEARTS.

"From this laudable course no oratorical thunder can drive Woodrow Wilson.

"Glittering epigrams, distorted facts, mental quibblings, and verbal twistings will fall upon him like darts without barbs.

"When the ship of state is rocked and tossed by angry waves and howling winds the passengers may lose their heads, but the captain will keep his.

"Excitable people whose European sympathies one way or the other have for the moment blinded them to the welfare of this land, and whose spokesman Mr. Root seems willing to become, may just as well realize once and for all that Woodrow Wilson will not swerve from the course he has laid out for himself in this crisis. He will refuse to surrender the powers of his great office to those who seek to plunge this country into needless war; he will continue to work for the preservation of its prosperity, the assurance of its happiness, and the maintenance of its honor, even if in so doing he brings down upon his head the bitter hostility that Washington had to face and that Lincoln silently suffered in every critical moment of his career.

"No reward, no punishment will make him swerve from what he knows to be his highest duty. He has preserved, strengthened, dignified, and uplifted our noblest national traditions, and he will continue to do so no matter what the cost or what the penalty.

"His ripe wisdom, his knowledge, his infinite patience have contributed more than all other factors combined to rescue the United States from that weight of woe and misery to which the rest of Christendom is now subjected.

"His fellow countrymen will not forget this.

"Already his name is inscribed on the red-leaved tablets of grateful human hearts.

"For these reasons the people of the United States will reelect Woodrow Wilson President to continue the good work he has so nobly begun.

"For these reasons the Democracy of New York follows where Woodrow Wilson leads; but we follow first and foremost for the reason that, amid dangers that threaten and criticism that misrepresents, with an admirable devotion to principle and a wonderful exposition of manhood, Woodrow Wilson stands for the Americanism which, under the magic spell of citizenship and the mystic influence of the Stars and Stripes, imbues Jew and Gentile, Russian, Austrian and Italian, German and Frenchman, Irishman and Englishman with the spirit of the country and teaches them to sing of this old flag of ours:

"Your flag and my flag
And how it waves to-day
O'er your land and my land
And half the world away!
Rose-red and blood-red
Its stripes forever gleam
Snow-white and soul-white
The good Forefather's dream;
Sky-blue and true-blue
Its star that shine aright
A glorious guidon of the day
A shelter through the night.

"Your flag and my flag,
And, oh, how much it holds
Of your heart and my heart
Secure within its folds.
Your heart and my heart
Beat quicker at its sight,
Sun-kissed and wind-tossed
The Red and Blue and White,
The One Flag, the Great Flag,
The flag for me and you
Glorified all else beside
The Red and White and Blue."

REPORT OF OIL SUPPLY.

Mr. PHELAN. I present a paper prepared by M. L. Requa, consulting engineer of the Bureau of Mines, on the exhaustion of the petroleum resources of the United States. It is a very pertinent matter, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. The subject matter is of very great interest to the Senate and to the Lands Committee. Therefore I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California desire to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. PHELAN. No; printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear the Senator's request.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Requa, consulting engineer of the Bureau of Mines, has prepared a statement on the exhaustion of the petroleum resources of the United States. The matter is now before the Lands Committee and the Senate. It is so valuable that the Bureau of Mines has asked me to have it printed as a public document because there are no funds in the possession of that bureau for the purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator whether it has been printed by the department in any form or not?

Mr. PHELAN. It has not been printed in any form. It is an original paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to let it go to the Committee on Printing. On the question of printing reports from departments we have decided that the departments themselves should do it. If this report never has been printed before, after an examination I would not have any objection, but I wish to examine it.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CALIFORNIA CHARTS AND BOOKS.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask at the same time that a paper prepared by Mr. P. Lee Phillips, chief of the Map and Charts Division, Congressional Library, on the subject of California charts and books be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to printing it as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 384. An act to amend the act of June 23, 1910, entitled "An act providing that entrymen for homesteads within the reclamation projects may assign their entries upon satisfactory proof of residence, improvement, and cultivation for five years, the same as though said entry had been made under the original homestead act," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 11156. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be appraised and to sell the Boise & Arrowrock Railroad, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask that Senate concurrent resolution No. 15 be temporarily laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We have not yet reached that order of business; but, unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from North Dakota will be complied with. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will report the concurrent resolution.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15) submitted by Mr. McCUMBER on the 3d instant, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, acting in his diplomatic capacity, has so far been unable to secure an understanding with the central belligerent powers of Europe with reference to the attack by submarines without notice on merchant ships of a belligerent nation armed for defense only; and

Whereas the President has maintained through all the negotiations that under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining the firing upon such merchant vessel by any warship without previous notice is illegal, and has notified the said central powers that American citizens have a clear right under international law to travel on such merchant vessels, and has further notified said central Governments that should the lives of American citizens be lost through such illegal acts the said powers would be held to strict accountability; and

Whereas the said central powers have declared that such armed merchant vessels would be considered and treated as ships of war and subject to attack as such without notice, and have further declared their purpose to so attack such merchant ships; and

Whereas it is conceded that the submarine, as an instrument of warfare, was unknown when such international rule was established; and

Whereas it is well known that such submarine by giving notice to an armed ship might endanger its own existence; and

Whereas in one instance at least, during the present war in Europe, a submarine has been sunk and its crew destroyed by such armed merchant ship; and

Whereas many new and novel means of warfare have been employed by all of the nations engaged in that struggle, raising new questions of rights and responsibilities, both as to neutrals and belligerents, and upon which opinions and views may justly differ; and

Whereas the President has requested that each branch of Congress shall express its conviction as to the propriety of warning the citizens of the United States to refrain from travel on such armed ships: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that, under the rules of international law heretofore obtaining, such merchant vessels, though armed with a stern gun of comparatively small caliber, and for defense only, has the status and rights in war of an unarmed merchant ship, but that the science of war has developed with such extraordinary rapidity during the present conflict, and new weapons of warfare, including the submarine and aero fighting craft, have been employed with such far-reaching consequences and which may threaten the very life of any one of the nations involved, and which may necessitate a revision of the codes of international law pertaining to the rights and duties of neutrals and belligerents in the light of such new instrumentalities; that, while the strict legal right of an American citizen under international law to travel and ship his goods on an armed merchant vessel may be an established right, it is none the less the moral and patriotic duty of every American citizen, in view of the desperate character of the warfare now raging in Europe and the desperate situation of each and all of the warring powers, to refrain from needlessly exposing himself to danger and, by his recklessness or audacity, involving his country, or threatening to involve it, in a conflict that may seriously affect the welfare of a hundred million of his fellow citizens; and that therefore the citizens of the United States should, and they are hereby requested, to refrain from travel on such armed merchant ships until an agreement has been reached between this country and other warring nations to the end that the endeavors of the President may not be jeopardized or halted or this Government forced into hostility with another country because of the unnecessary or reckless attitude of any citizen of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in view of a rather sharp turn of events during the last 24 hours in our international tangle; in view of what seems to be an authorized statement from the Secretary of State "that seagoing Americans will presently find themselves as effectually warned against passage on armed merchantmen as though this Government had in fact put into force either the Gore or the McLemore resolution"; and in view of the fact that new proposals and counterproposals are being presented by the contending nations, all of which indicate a tendency toward settlement of the U-boat controversy, I feel that any resolution dealing with this question would be improper and possibly embarrassing at this time. The resolution introduced by me, pertinent at a time when the President himself was asking for an expression from Congress and in response to that request, under these changed conditions ought, in my opinion, now to be withdrawn. As the resolution is a concise expression of my own views as to the duty of American citizens during this controversy, if occasion demands it in the future I shall reintroduce it.

I ask, therefore, permission to withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota has a right to withdraw the resolution without permission. At his request, the resolution is withdrawn.

PORTRAIT OF JOHN LANGDON.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, and I ask the indulgence of the Senate to call attention to an historical fact connected with it which will occupy about five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 118) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library is hereby authorized to have made an oil portrait of John Langdon, the first President pro tempore of the Senate, to be hung in the main corridor of the Senate, the cost not to exceed the sum of $1,500, and to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some years ago the late Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, suggested to me that a bust of John Langdon, the first President pro tempore of the Senate, should be placed in the Capitol, but as no busts other than those of Vice Presidents had been so placed it did not seem to me desirable to ask for an appropriation for the suggested purpose.

From that time until now I have had it in mind that John Langdon deserved some recognition on the part of the Senate of the United States.

It will be recalled that when the forces under Gens. Howe and Burgoyne planned to unite and maintain communication from New York to Canada by the Hudson River and Lakes George and Champlain, thus separating our forces into two distinct and feeble sections, the danger was recognized as being very great, and the fear of the people became intense. The authorities of Vermont sent word to the councilors of New Hampshire that unless speedy assistance came to them they would be compelled to yield to the power they could not successfully resist. Had this been done the cause of the colonists might have been lost. When this message came the Assembly of New Hampshire was not in session, but they were immediately summoned. In three days they had assembled. The emergencies were great and their resources few. Apparently everything had been done that could be done. The public credit was exhausted, and many despaired of being able either to raise or support another regiment. At that time John Langdon, a merchant of Portsmouth, was speaker of the house. He addressed the representatives as follows:

I have $3,000 in hard money; my plate I will pledge for as much more. I have 70 hogsheads of Tobago rum, which shall be sold for the most they will bring. These are at the service of the State. If we succeed, I shall be remunerated; if not, they will be of no use to me. We can raise a brigade, and our friend Stark, who so nobly sustained the honor of our arms at Bunker Hill, may safely be intrusted with the command, and we will check Burgoyne.

A messenger was dispatched for Col. Stark, who had resigned from the Army some time previously. Stark immediately responded in person, and accepted the command of the militia. The reappearance of their old commander filled the people with enthusiasm. The militia enlisted with alacrity, and soon more men had volunteered than had been authorized.

The Battle of Bennington shortly followed, at which Stark achieved a notable victory, for which he received the thanks of Congress. Had it not been for the patriotism and liberality of John Langdon it is doubtful if Burgoyne's advance could have been checked and the Army stores at Bennington saved for our forces.

As stated in the resolution, John Langdon was the first President pro tempore of the Senate, being elected April 6, 1789, serving in the First Congress and also in the second session of the Second Congress. From the Biographical Congressional Directory I take the following sketch of this illustrious son of New Hampshire:

Langdon, John, a Delegate and Senator from New Hampshire; born in Portsmouth, N. H., June 25, 1741; attended the school of Maj. Hale in Portsmouth; engaged in mercantile pursuits; prominent in ante-Revolutionary affairs and during the war; a representative in the general court; elected to the Continental Congress 1775–76; resigned in 1776 to become Navy agent, and superintended the construction of several ships of war; served several terms as speaker of the State house of representatives, and during the session of 1777 staked his fortune to equip Gen. John Stark's brigade; participated in the Battle of Bennington, and commanded a company at Saratoga and in Rhode Island; again a Delegate in the Continental Congress in 1783; president of New Hampshire in 1785; delegate to the Federal constitutional convention in 1787; governor in 1788, 1805, 1809, and 1810–11; elected as a Democrat to the United States Senate, and served from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1801; elected the first President of the Senate pro tempore April 6, 1789; declined the offer of Secretary of the Navy in 1811 and the Democratic nomination for Vice President in 1812; died in Portsmouth, N. H., September 18, 1819.

Surely such a man deserves the recognition that is proposed, and I sincerely hope that it may be speedily granted.

I move that the resolution, under the terms of the statute, be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. Morning business is closed.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1417, to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I had intended to say a word or two, and I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

Upon reflection and consultation with a number of other Senators, I have decided, speaking for myself only, so far as I am concerned, not to oppose the motion of the Senator from South Carolina. If that motion prevails, I hope, after the disposition of that bill, to be able to get up House bill 408, which is the bill providing for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto. I now give notice that immediately after the disposition of the bill which is the subject of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina I shall move that the Senate take up and consider House bill 408.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask the permission of the Senate to speak for just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent will be granted, unless there is objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill which stands first on the calendar as a live bill for action is the judiciary bill. I have consented to yield to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and to vote for it; but from this time on I shall resist, in every way within my power, taking up or disposing of any measure until this judiciary bill, which is at the head of the calendar, has a hearing. I gave the notice quite a length of time ago. I do not think we ought to jump down through the calendar and take up special bills unless they are of an emergency character, like the armor bill which the Senator from South Carolina has presented.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not understand what the Senator from Montana said he had concluded to do with reference to his bill.

Mr. MYERS. The substance of what I said was that speaking for myself alone, so far as I am concerned, after reflection and consultation with a number of other Senators, I had decided not to oppose the motion made by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator could not persuade the friends of the other bill to yield to his wishes, then?

Mr. MYERS. I could not. I was unable to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who sat here patiently week after week thinking that the bill under consideration at that time would be completed, and having a speech prepared on the subject in which the Senator from South Carolina is so much interested, was compelled to leave the city, and will not be back for some days—probably not for 9 or 10 days. I think he made an appeal to others, as well as to myself, that this bill might not be rushed through until he could be heard on it.

I have been here a good while, and it has been a very rare circumstance that a bill has been forced upon the Senate under conditions such as I have detailed.

The Senator from Massachusetts, I know, was prepared to speak on the bill, and has been for weeks, and hoped to have an opportunity to do so. It has been suggested to me by one Senator that the Senator from Massachusetts has gone out on a political mission. There is nothing at all in that. The Senator from Massachusetts had engagements that he had to keep, not of a political nature. I sincerely hope that the bill may not be pushed through to final disposition in the absence of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire that it is not my purpose to push it through without the Senator from Massachusetts having the fullest opportunity to be heard. All I want is to have an understanding as to a day on which it will be voted on.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all I desire. The assurance the Senator from South Carolina has given is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest that the Senator telegraph him right off to come right back here as soon as he possibly can.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not do that. I would not telegraph the Senator from South Carolina, if he were home, to come back here when he was not prepared to come. The Senator from Massachusetts will of necessity be absent for 9 or 10 days.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I can not consent that this bill shall be delayed for 9 or 10 days, and I do not suppose the Senator from South Carolina will.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I can not, either.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then we shall have to detain it; that is all.

Mr. SWANSON. That is for the Senate to determine. We think the most urgent business of any Senator is his work here in the Senate. We will give the Senator from Massachusetts ample time to return and speak and vote, but we can not consent to delay this bill 9 or 10 days.

Mr. GALLINGER. That has not been the rule of the Senate heretofore; and if the usual courtesy is not to be extended to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. SWANSON. It is time for the rule to be established that the business of the Senate is the most important matter upon which any Senator can be engaged. The delay has been sufficiently long.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia is no more interested in enforcing the rules of the Senate than the rest of us. Of course, I have no power to enforce anything in this matter; but I simply wish to say that if this courtesy is denied the Senator from Massachusetts, possibly courtesy will be denied to other Senators in the future. It has not been the habit of the Senate to do things in that way.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like also to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from Massachusetts made no request of the Senator from South Carolina, nor to me, for any delay of this measure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I made the request in his behalf.

Mr. SWANSON. It has already been delayed here for about six weeks. I think the Senator from Massachusetts should be notified that the matter is up for consideration and that every opportunity will be given him in a reasonable time to return, speak, and have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Massachusetts probably will not determine his action by any suggestion of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts will doubtless take his own time to return to the Senate, and there is going to be no dragnet sent out to pull him in here.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that every reasonable opportunity and courtesy will be extended to the Senator from Massachusetts; but, as far as I have power in the matter, this bill will not be delayed and defeated by the absence of Senators who have an opportunity to return here and speak and vote on it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Virginia suggests that this bill has been delayed for several weeks. All other bills on the calendar, more than a hundred in number, have been delayed. This is not a bill that stands by itself as having been discriminated against; and certainly no great harm can come to the bill itself, or to the interests of the country, if it is delayed a few days.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was in the Committee on Naval Affairs on last Tuesday and never said a word to me about being absent, or anything of the kind, and never asked for any delay on this bill at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I have asked it for him.

Mr. REED. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Massachusetts; but the Chair had intended to call attention to the fact that this debate is proceeding in violation of the rule of the Senate, and if it shall proceed after the Senator from Massachusetts concludes it must be done by consent of the Senate.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I was about to address the Chair to say substantially what has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire. I did not see my colleague [Mr. LODGE] immediately before his departure; but he had stated to me several times that he was extremely interested in this bill, and that he had prepared a comprehensive speech upon the subject. I think it is, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated, unusual and unfair to take up the bill at a time when my colleague has made arrangements not to attend political meetings but to keep engagements of another character. I think it is the first time my colleague has been absent from the Senate this winter, and it seems to me that proper courtesy should be shown him by refraining from acting finally on this bill until he has filled his engagements and returned to the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator consent to set a time to vote on this bill next week?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania will please state it.

Mr. OLIVER. If this motion is carried at this time, will it make this bill the unfinished business after 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is under consideration at that time; yes. Morning business is closed. The effect of the adoption of the motion will be to keep the bill the business of the Senate as long as the Senate chooses to consider it. It will not require another motion after 2 o'clock to bring it under consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I wish to make another inquiry, Mr. President. Under those circumstances, what opportunity will be afforded to those who wish to debate the motion to take it up and make it the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the unfinished business by reason of the fact that it is under consideration at the hour of adjournment.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to say a few words with regard to taking up this bill, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules of the Senate, unfortunately, the Senator can not debate the matter until after 2 o'clock.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent to say a few words on that matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to debate the motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I object.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say that it will take only a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair can not consider the request. The question is on the adoption of the motion of the Senator from South Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1417.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERN (when Mr. FLETCHER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on official business. This announcement may stand for the day. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when Mr. HARDWICK's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HARDWICK] is detained from the Senate by sickness in his family. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I again desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. In his absence I refrain from voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY], who is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH].

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], who is unavoidably absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on important business.

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 10, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The SECRETARY. The committee report to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to provide, either by the erection of a factory or by the purchase of a factory, or both, for the manufacture of armor for the vessels of the Navy; said factory or factories to have an annual capacity of not less than 20,000 tons of armor; and the sum of $11,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the purposes of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. TILLMAN. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment read is a substitute for the original bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The Senator from South Carolina submits an amendment to the amendment of the committee. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment of the committee the following words:

The expenditures for drafting, technical, expert, and clerical assistants necessary shall be paid from the appropriation herein made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no objection that I can see to adopting the committee amendment, as a whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, a Senator to whom we have always tried to be extremely courteous because he is always courteous, that if he will make a request that the final vote on this bill shall be taken one week from Wednesday I certainly shall not object to it, and I do not think any one on this side will object.

Mr. TILLMAN. I agree to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from South Carolina make that request for unanimous consent?

Mr. TILLMAN. In order to be courteous to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], with whom I have been associated for 20 years and more, I ask unanimous consent that a final vote on the bill and all amendments thereto shall be had on Wednesday a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. At 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At what hour?

Mr. TILLMAN. At 4 o'clock, if not before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous consent agreement will be reduced to writing. [After a pause.] The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock, Wednesday, March 22, 1916, the Senate shall proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it correctly stated, the Chair will ask the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I think it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does any Senator present object?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not think there ought to be a provision in the agreement that we shall proceed to act on any amendment that may be offered without any debate. If the usual reservation we have been making heretofore is incorporated in this agreement, I shall have no objection at all; that is, that after 4 o'clock Senators may speak 5 or 10 minutes on an amendment, and not more than once. I would make no objection to it then, but I think that ought to be in the request. Unless something of that kind is incorporated in it I shall feel disposed to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina consent to the modification indicated by the Senator from Washington?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know whether I ought to consent to it or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator should make up his mind pretty quickly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will not consent to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will not?

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request in its present form without the modification suggested?

Mr. JONES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will allow me, I wish to say that I think we can assure him that if the final vote is postponed until the date mentioned, Wednesday the 22d—that is, if no effort is made to bring about a vote before that time—there will be no effort whatever on the part of those, and I number myself among them, who are violently opposed to this legislation. There will be no attempt to delay the vote or to delay the consideration of the bill longer than next Wednesday a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the substitute as amended be read and that the report of the committee be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before we pass from this subject, I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from South Carolina, and I do it as one of the Members of the Senate who is very much in favor of this legislation. I should like to have the Senator consent to the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], which seems to me to be a fair and reasonable one. It only provides that when an amendment shall be offered at that time it shall not be voted upon without any debate. A Senator ought to have five minutes to explain his amendment, if he offers one at that time. It certainly will not delay the bill more than an hour or two at the outside, and it may not delay it at all. It seems to me to be a very reasonable request.

Mr. TILLMAN. I withdraw the objection that I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will modify his request?

Mr. TILLMAN. I modify the request to conform to the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed agreement as modified will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock p. m. Wednesday, March 22, 1916, the Senate shall proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m. on said day, March 22, 1916, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the proposed agreement in its present form. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers
Bankhead	Cummins	Jones	Nelson
Beckham	Curtis	Kenyon	Newlands
Borah	Dillingham	Kern	Norris
Brandegee	du Pont	La Follette	O'Gorman

Chilton	Gronna	Lewis	Page
Clapp	Harding	McCumber	Phelan
Clark, Wyo.	Hollis	Martin, Va.	Pittman
Clarke, Ark.	Johnson, Me.	Martine, N. J.	Poindexter

Pomerene	Sheppard	Smoot	Vardaman
Ransdell	Shields	Sterling	Wadsworth
Reed	Simmons	Sutherland	Warren
Robinson	Smith, Ga.	Swanson	Weeks
Saulsbury	Smith, Md.	Thompson	Williams
Shafroth	Smith, Mich.	Tillman	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will report to the Senate the request for unanimous consent as heretofore preferred by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand the Senator from South Carolina for good reasons desires to have the vote taken on the 21st, and we do not object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request will be modified in respect to that matter. The Secretary will read it in the amended form.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock p. m., on Tuesday, March 21, 1916, the Senate shall proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill, Senate bill 1417, to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., on said day, March 21, 1916, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the bill is to be laid aside?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; not laid aside, because I want to have the report read. I ask that the amendment of the committee as amended be agreed to, and that the bill as amended be reprinted, and I then ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have already asked for the reading of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first matter in order will be the question on adopting the amendment of the committee as amended. If there be no amendment to the original text of the bill, the question is on the adoption of the substitute as amended. The question is on the agreeing to the substitute.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

The Secretary read Report No. 115, submitted by Mr. TILLMAN February 8, 1916, as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 1417:

The Committee on Naval Affairs to whom was referred the bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it with an amendment.

The relation of the United States Government to the armor-plate manufacturers has been a continual source of dissatisfaction to those Members of Congress who really do not believe in the doctrine of favoritism to special interests, or in the protective system at all, and a condition has existed little short of scandalous. From 1887, when Secretary Whitney made the first contract with the Bethlehem Co., to 1915, when Secretary Daniels refused to award any contracts at all, investigation has followed investigation without result.

The very nature of the armor-plate business makes such a condition inevitable. There is only one customer in the United States for the product—the Government—and the large capital required to found an armor plant excludes all but the largest concerns from the business. There are only three manufacturers of armor plate in this country, and the result is either a monopoly or a combine of the worst type. None of the conditions that tend to check monopoly are present. The number of manufacturers is necessarily limited and the Government is compelled to buy their product, regardless of the price charged, because the law does not allow the Secretary of the Navy to go outside of this country to buy it. The manufacturers have no fear of private competition, for there is not sufficient demand for armor to justify the entrance of other parties. The economic principle which declares that to increase the price of a monopolistic product beyond a certain limit automatically decreases the demand for it does not obtain, because the United States Government is compelled to armor its vessels, regardless of cost. It is plain that Congress can pass as many laws as it chooses to pass and give the Secretary of the Navy a much discretion as he may ask without remedying the situation. As long as present conditions continue the armor manufacturers are in a position to force the United States Government, in the language of the highwayman, to "stand and deliver."

The committee has no desire to criticize unjustly the manufacturers of armor plate. They have done no more than most other men would have done under similar circumstances and temptations. Men in the pursuit of wealth are essentially greedy and hoggish, and the protective principle seems to have been prolific in producing some magnificent specimens. The main fact to be borne in mind is that they have more power than is compatible with the public interest. Give power to any set of men, however excellent and honorable, and sooner or later they will abuse it. Men have been built that way since the beginning of time.

The history of armor-plate making in America is interesting and significant in view of the foregoing observations.

The change from wooden ships to ships of iron and steel was authorized by the act of August 5, 1882, which orders—

"That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repairs of any wooden ship when the estimated cost of such repairs shall exceed 30 per cent of the estimated cost of a new ship of the same size and like material."

Secretary of the Navy W. E. Chandler really began the new Navy, for he made the contract with the John Roach Co. for the first four iron ships—the Atlanta, Baltimore, Chicago, and Dolphin. The Dolphin is still in active service as a dispatch boat, showing how thoroughly well it must have been built. It is now about 33 years old.

The next step was to get armor for these iron vessels. There was no armor being manufactured at all in the United States, the armor for the Miantonomah having been imported from England at a cost of about $550 per ton. Secretary Whitney induced the Bethlehem Co. to enter upon the manufacture of armor, it having one of the largest iron plants in the country, and the price agreed on varied from five to six hundred dollars per ton. The Bethlehem Co. and the Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. were the only two concerns that bid at all. Whitney did not make a close or tight bargain, as he knew the company must necessarily be put to large expense, and he was willing to allow a liberal price on that account. He felt that it was desirable, if not absolutely necessary, that we should have armor manufacturers in the United States; and his successor, Mr. Tracy, felt that there should be more than one concern in the business, and he induced the Carnegie Steel Co. to enter it. There was a dispute with the Carnegie Co. about the price. Mr. Carnegie insisted he must receive the same price the Bethlehem people were getting or he would not touch it. Secretary Whitney further agreed for each pound of armor plate used he would set aside 2 cents to indemnify the company for any damages it might sustain for infringing on certain patents held by the Schneider Co. in France.

Having reason to believe the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies were in collusion or combination, Senator Chandler offered a resolution in the Senate instructing the committee as follows:

"To inquire whether the prices paid or agreed to be paid for armor for vessels of the Navy have been fair and reasonable; also whether any prices paid have been increased on account of patent processes used for the introduction of nickel, or for cementation by the Harvey process; and if so, whether the increases in price are fair and reasonable; whether the issuance of any of the patents was expedited at the request of the Navy Department; whether such patents were properly issued and were for inventions not previously known or used, and who were and are the owners of such patents; whether any officers of the Government were interested therein, or at the time when any contracts were made were or have since been interested in the patents or employed by the owners thereof; and whether any legislation is necessary to further promote the manufacture and cheapen the price of armor for vessels of the Navy."

This resolution passed the Senate on December 31, 1895, and under it the first senatorial investigation of armor was begun.

The first bill for the erection of an armor-plate factory was introduced on January 22, 1896, by Senator Smith, of New Jersey. This bill provided that the factory be erected in the city of Washington.

Secretary Herbert, on January 5, 1897, stated in reference to the Bethlehem plant, basing his estimates on data obtained from the company itself, that—

"Whatever may have been the cost of the armor plant and the gun plant, whatever may have been paid for the secrets of manufacture or for patents, or whatever may have been interest on working capital, all those and other charges have been paid from the gross earnings of the company; and the results show the company's investments in the plant to make armor and gun steel for the Government have been returned with 22 per cent thereon."

According to Secretary Herbert, in seven years the plant had paid for itself and, in addition, had returned 22 per cent of itself; and practically the same statement was made of the Carnegie Co. These facts prove the assertion often made by Senator TILLMAN—that the Government had built the plants and then given them to those two companies.

Secretary Daniels, in his current report, states:

"Since the passage of the naval act of June 7, 1900, the Navy Department has spent $76,195,960 for armor for its ships. It is believed that if the intent of Congress to order the erection of a factory had been carried out at that time the Government would have saved enough money on armor plate to own a plant as large as that owned by all three of the private companies and in the meantime to have supplied the armor plate for its own ships at a less price than it has been compelled to pay."

The facts as brought out go to prove this beyond dispute.

In 1903 the Midvale Steel Co. entered the field, but its entry has made no material difference in the situation as to cost of armor to the Government. Of course, they were lured by the hope of profit. Being skillful metallurgists and iron masters, just by walking through the Bethlehem and Carnegie works they could see that the profits were large. But that company did not build an armor plant until they had bid five times and were denied participation in the contracts because they did not have any plant in which to manufacture it. They had underbid the older companies, but the Government, for some unexplained reason, though ostensibly it was because the President or the Secretary of the Navy elected to believe that the new company could not build a plant and deliver the armor in accordance with their contract, gave the awards to Bethlehem and Carnegie.

Mr. Barba, then president of the Midvale Steel Co., stated to the Tillman committee that "I remember that our original bid contemplated beginning delivery in 26 months, during which time we hoped to be able to erect a plant that would enable us to begin delivery of the comparatively small sizes of armor which were required for the purposes of the Navy at that time." When Mr. Barba was asked, "Didn't you believe that Carnegie and Bethlehem had a good thing, and therefore you wanted to share in it?" answered, "Unquestionably." To show the bias of the Navy Department in favor of Carnegie and Bethlehem, Mr. Barba testified that the Midvale Co. received about one-third of the amount—16,000 tons—needed by the department, at $397 per ton, and two-thirds was given to the Carnegie and Bethlehem companies, at $450.60 per ton.

After having been turned down five times, the construction of a plant was begun by the Midvale Co. in 1903 and had progressed so far toward completion that the Secretary of the Navy awarded them a contract, they being the lowest bidder. So far so good; this was honest competition. But once in, they were recognized by the old companies, who took them in partnership, as it were, for thereafter the price offered by each of the three did not materially vary.

The effort of the Government to obtain competition among armor makers had failed. It should be said to the credit of the Midvale Co.,

however, that they refused to pay a royalty to either Harvey or Krupp and defended a suit through all the courts up to the United States Supreme Court, which sustained their contention that they had done nothing for which to pay a royalty.

When the special committee, consisting of Senator TILLMAN, Congressman PADGETT, and Admiral Strauss, investigated the whole subject last year, that committee could not obtain any authoritative or reliable information whatever as to the cost of armor. There was every evidence of combination and collusion instead of competition, but no proof. But given three companies with a single fixed purchaser of their products, the consumer who is compelled to buy, and monopoly or combination, tacit or avowed, is certain to follow. The nature of the case excludes proof in a juridical sense of the term, but it invites an unerring moral conviction.

Secretary Daniels, in his last report and in his statement before the Senate Naval Committee, said the three bids in the last "competition" agreed to a cent.

The hearing before the committee brought out no new facts. The armor men of 1916 showed the same capacity for talking without saying anything as that exhibited so artistically by their brethren of earlier years. The same talk of the "value of trade secrets"; the same reluctance to talk cost of production; the same plea of having been encouraged by the Government to go into the business and the consequent unfairness of Government competition; the same inability to recognize that if such a quasi partnership as they claim exists between them and the Government they should in all fairness, shoulder its liabilities as well as insist on its benefits; indeed, about the only material difference between the hearings of 1916 and those other numerous ones that have followed each other so regularly and so fruitlessly since 1895 is that of dates. To go into these reports would be a waste of time. They are published in pamphlet form and can be easily obtained by interested parties from the document room. The hearings before the Senate committee on this subject are also obtainable, as they have been printed.

It suffices to say that the committee is of the opinion that the Government has been charged unreasonable prices for its armor plate, and that the only remedy lies in the Government owning and operating a plant, as provided for in Senate bill 1417. Should the Government build it and then lock it up, and it never be used, it would be wise to erect it, as it would serve as a warning to private manufacturers that there is a point beyond which the Government will not be driven and where patience ceases to be a virtue.

The committee, therefore, by a vote of 9 to 3 of those present, ordered the bill reported favorably, and expresses the hope that it will soon become a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I inquire if there is any Senator ready to go on and discuss the pending bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. TILLMAN. If not, I suggest that the bill might be temporarily laid aside, and some of the other bills which have been struggling to get a hearing here might be taken up instead.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if it might not be well, inasmuch as there are now 143 bills on the calendar, to lay aside the unfinished business and take up the calendar for the consideration of unobjected cases? We ought to do that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have nothing to do with that; that is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My objection to that is that I was about to move to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 706.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator desired the first bill on the calendar considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is one of the first on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to have something before the Senate, the Chair will ask, Does the Senator from South Carolina ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Georgia if unanimous consent could not be given at this time to take up the calendar, under Rule VIII, and proceed with the consideration of bills to which there is no objection. I will say to the Senator that there are 19 pages of bills under Rule VIII of the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not require unanimous consent for that; it is the regular order to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Georgia was going to make a motion, and I was addressing him with that fact in view.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the regular order to take up such bills where there is no objection, with the privilege to move to take up a bill when it is reached if objection is made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but not when we have unanimous consent simply to consider unobjected cases.

Mr. SMOOT. We have 19 pages of bills on the calendar, and there are very few of them to which there is objection. If we can spend a couple of hours to-day on those bills, I believe we can clear the calendar of the bills to which there is no objection, and allow them to go to the House, so that the House may act upon them at an early date. Then, Mr. President, I would have no objection to the Senator from Georgia making his motion to take up the bill of which he speaks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the request is made that the Senate consider unobjected cases until 4 o'clock, I would agree to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will ask unanimous consent of the Senate that we proceed to the consideration of the calendar, beginning with order No. 8; that we consider only bills to which there is no objection; and that we continue the consideration of such bills until the hour of 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not longer than the hour of 4 o'clock?

Mr. SMOOT. Not longer than the hour of 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to go with that the announcement that as soon as the consent order is over, I shall move to take up the judiciary bill to which I have referred. With that understanding, I will not object. I know the importance of agreeing to the request of the Senator, and I wish to facilitate Senators in having consideration for their special bills, so I make no objection to the request, but as soon as that order is concluded, or not later than 4 o'clock, I shall move to take up this judiciary bill.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the Senator yield to me to make a motion for a special order?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Pennsylvania can do that as soon as the unanimous consent for which I have asked is agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. If that means that at 4 o'clock we are going to abandon the calendar for any particular bill, I should object to that.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator could move at that time to take up a bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. We shall pass all of the unobjected cases long before 4 o'clock.

Mr. CLAPP. We may do so, but I am not going to agree now that at 4 o'clock we shall cease the consideration of the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is endeavoring to obtain is a unanimous-consent agreement until 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; not later than 4 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Provided it requires until 4 o'clock to dispose of all of the unobjected bills on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Now, let us see what the agreement is for which consent is asked. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unobjected bills.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and that the consideration of such bills on the calendar be continued not later than 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the request does not require any call of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will not hold that it does, unless some Senator insists upon it. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah that the Senate proceed to the consideration at this time of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII until the hour of 4 o'clock, at which time any Senator will be at liberty to move to take up any bill on the calendar? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that Senate resolution No. 107 be made a special order for consideration to-morrow, Friday afternoon, at 3 o'clock; and, if necessary, I will explain my reasons for making the motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the resolution?

Mr. OLIVER. It is a resolution reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who, I think, would make the motion now if he were present. It refers to leases of oil lands in the Osage oil country.

I will state, Mr. President, that the reason for this request is that these lands, or a large part of them, are advertised for sale on the 15th instant, and if action is to be taken by the Senate it must be taken at once. By agreement this matter has been postponed in order to await the return of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is obliged to be away to-day, but who will be back to-morrow and who has agreed to have the resolution taken up to-morrow afternoon, he being opposed to it. Under all the circumstances it is something that I think is worthy of being considered as a special order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator is out of order at this time, I think. We have agreed to an order of business to continue until 4 o'clock. Furthermore, it will take unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator object? The request of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution referred to by him. The Chair does not assume that that will conflict with the pending order of business.

Mr. OLIVER. It will not conflict with the pending order at all, but merely makes the resolution to which I have referred a special order for to-morrow afternoon, and I trust the Senator will not object to it. It is an important matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am obliged to object.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I make the motion, Mr. President, that the resolution to which I have referred be made the special order for to-morrow, Friday afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is entitled to make that motion. It will take two-thirds to adopt it, however. As many as favor making the order——

Mr. OVERMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement to proceed with the calendar, is it in order to do other business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. OLIVER. I earnestly hope the Senator from Georgia will not insist on his objection. This is a matter which has been pending since January in the Indian Affairs Committee, and it is reported from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please state it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would not the adoption of the motion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania displace the unfinished business, which is the armor-plate bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would displace it, of course, until the time arrived to vote on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Until 4 o'clock a week from Tuesday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there any unfinished business at present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not. There is a unanimous-consent agreement that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but there is no unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It has been temporarily laid aside, and maintains its place as the unfinished business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would it be the unfinished business unless it is under consideration at the time of adjournment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not before the Senate at this time. By unanimous consent it has been laid aside temporarily, which means until to-morrow after 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of the Chair's statement some time ago that the matter became the unfinished business, as a matter of fact, upon the happening of certain contingencies, I did not understand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it was made the unfinished business by unanimous consent, I agree that it could be done. I did not understand that that had happened. I thought we had proceeded to the consideration of the bill, and I did not think that yet made it the unfinished business. I admit it could be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent it was temporarily laid aside as the unfinished business, with all the privileges and rights of the unfinished business. That would take it over until to-morrow at 2 o'clock, unless the Senator in charge of it should move to take it up at an earlier time.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the regular order.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order now is the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a bill similar to this, to take the place of it, will be reported from the Public Lands Committee. Therefore I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I move that Senate resolution 89 and Senate resolution 90, being resolutions authorizing the Committee on the Library and the Committee on Interstate Commerce, respectively, to employ stenographers, be taken up at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. That motion is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks, under the unanimous-consent agreement, the bills must be disposed of in the order in which they stand on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (S. 1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand that under our agreement no motion can be made at this time to proceed to the consideration of a bill in spite of objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Therefore I do not make the motion. I just made that suggestion to apply to other bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 609) to aid in the erection of a monument to Pocahontas at Jamestown, Va., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 611) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Matthew Fontaine Maury, of Virginia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. JAMES. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 72) to provide for holding the San Antonio Bicentennial Exposition in 1918 was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2406) to amend section 162 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) authorizing and directing the Department of Labor to make an inquiry into the cost of living in the District of Columbia and to report thereon to Congress as early as practicable, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a representative from the Department of Labor called upon me the other day in relation to this joint resolution, and suggested certain amendments to it. I will ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] if the amendments have been brought to his attention?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; there should be an amendment to the joint resolution. The words "exclusive of Government employees" should be omitted from the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. That is an amendment reported by the committee. I have the papers over at my office, and I really did not expect the joint resolution to come up to-day. The Senator will not object to its going over?

Mr. KENYON. I did not expect it would come up, either.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The joint resolution will be passed over.

EVA M. BOWMAN.

The bill (S. 136) for the relief of Eva M. Bowman was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to Eva M. Bowman, widow of Robert L. Bowman, who was killed in the discharge of his duty as Indian agent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator reporting the bill if this is the amount of the salary of the deceased for the year or more than that?

Mr. CLAPP. No; it is based upon the proposition that that is a fair amount to award the widow. It is not based upon the amount of the man's salary.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator briefly state the circumstances to the Senate?

Mr. CLAPP. The circumstances are that there was a sort of drunken outbreak at the agency—I think it was in lower California, but I would not be certain—and the deceased very properly attempted to quell the disturbance, in the discharge of his duty, and restore order and peace. In performing that duty he was killed. He left this family.

That is a statement of the facts. The bill has been favorably reported two or three times.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMER D. LEWIS.

The bill (S. 137) for the relief of Omer D. Lewis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Omer D. Lewis, lease clerk at the Flathead Indian Agency, Mont., the sum of $2,573.25, for expenses incurred for hospital and doctors' fees for personal injuries received while aiding Federal officers in suppressing the sale of liquor to Indians.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the author of the bill whether this is intended to reimburse the claimant for expenditures, or whether it is compensation for injuries?

Mr. CLAPP. No; this is to reimburse him for the expenditures that he made in litigation because of his activity in suppressing the liquor traffic. That is my recollection, at least.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have not a copy of the bill before me, but, as I remember the reading of it, it relates to expenses incurred for hospital treatment and matters of that sort. It does not seem to relate to expenses incurred in litigation.

Mr. CLAPP. There are a number of these cases, and I may have been mistaken as to this particular one. As I recall, this is not a matter of compensation, but a matter of reimbursement.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I heard the bill read, it relates to an expenditure for medical treatment and hospital expenses.

Mr. CLAPP. Let the report be read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have the bill in my hand now. It makes the appropriation "for expenses incurred for hospital and doctors' fees for personal injuries received while aiding Federal officers in suppressing the sale of liquor to Indians." A bill of over $2,500 is an enormous hospital bill; and I think I shall ask that the bill go over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before it goes over, let me suggest that the words "doctors' fees" be stricken out and the words "medical attendance" substituted. It is a better phrase.

Mr. CLAPP. That will be unnecessary if it goes over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be amended first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "doctors' fees" and to insert in lieu thereof "medical attendance."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill, under objection, will be passed over.

JOHANNES T. JENSEN.

The bill (S. 1810) for the relief of Johannes T. Jensen, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Johannes T. Jensen, of Hoboken, N. J., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,380, on account of injuries received by him while in the discharge of his duty as an employee of the United States under the supervision and direction of the Isthmian Canal Commission on the Isthmus of Panama on the 3d day of April, 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 2, lines 4 and 5, to strike out: "To Mary W. Littell, widow of William J. Littell, deceased, of Lincoln County, $632.18," so as to make the clause read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

To Anastacio de Baca, administrator of Francisco de Baca, deceased, of Santa Ana County, $1,325.

To Edward H. Bergmann, of New Mexico, $1,200.

To W. J. Goodwin, of New Mexico, formerly of Woodruff County, Ark., $2,980.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEMNITY TO THE NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT.

The bill (S. 3264) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Norwegian Government for the detention of three subjects of Norway in Hudson County, N. J., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the payment out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Norwegian Government, of the sum of $2,787.78 as full indemnity to second mate Trygve Anderson, deck boy Sigurd Nilsen, and Arthur Rasmussen, Norwegian subjects, members of the crew of the Norwegian ship called the Ingrid, who were detained by the authorities of Hudson County, N. J., as witnesses in a criminal case in that county, and subsequently released on habeas corpus proceedings instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GUARANTEEING OF BANK DEPOSITS.

The bill (S. 710) to authorize national banking associations to avail themselves of State laws providing for the guaranteeing of deposits, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that every national banking association doing business in a State where there is a State law providing for the securing of deposits in State banks shall be, and is hereby, authorized, if permitted by the laws of such State, to avail itself of such State law, and to take the necessary steps under the laws of such State to guarantee its deposits.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARCUS A. JORDAN.

The bill (S. 888) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to confer upon Marcus A. Jordan the life-saving medal of the first class, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Library, with an amendment, on lines 8 and 9, to strike out the following words: "while said vessel was sailing in the storm-tossed and shark-infested waters of the Java Sea," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to award the life-saving medal of the first class to Marcus A. Jordan for most gallant and meritorious action in effecting the rescue of a woman who had fallen overboard from the Hamburg-American liner Cleveland on December 16, 1911.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LODGE NO. 6, ANCIENT FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS, OF VIRGINIA.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 24) authorizing the Librarian of Congress to return to Williamsburg Lodge, No. 6, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Virginia, the original manuscript of the record of the proceedings of said lodge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Librarian of Congress to return to Williamsburg Lodge, No. 6, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, of Virginia, the original manuscript of the record of the proceedings of said lodge, which is contained in one bound volume now in the Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress, marked "Williamsburg Lodge, 5775," and which manuscript was taken from the files of said lodge during the Civil War by some party or parties unknown.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The bill (H. R. 562) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a Postal Savings System, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The bill (H. R. 408) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think we could very profitably spend the afternoon in the consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the former order the Senate is considering only unobjected bills at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Of course; but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] here the other day pursued very successful tactics in forcing the consideration of his bill for granting 7,000,000 acres of land to the State of Nevada by objecting to the consideration of any bills on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I objected to this bill.

Mr. WALSH. It may be that in course of time we shall be forced to emulate that kind of tactics for the purpose of getting consideration of a bill which occupies the position of a kind of a stepchild in this family.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is well known, and I think the Senator from Montana realizes, that this bill will require very prolonged consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Days and days.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will probably require several days.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have asked that it go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. For that reason I think we ought to proceed with unobjected bills under the order without the threat implied in the Senator's statement being executed.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I did not intend to say anything of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thought not.

Mr. WALSH. I simply rose to endeavor to give the Senate an idea that this is an important measure, and that a number of us in the West believe it is of equal importance to any bill on the calendar or which is likely to go there. We are simply asking consideration for it. I see no reason why there should be, I take occasion to say, any protracted debate upon the bill after the extended discussion the subject has had. Notwithstanding what anyone may say about the matter, I undertake to say now that the discussion of this bill, whenever it comes up, will pursue identically the lines followed in the consideration of the other water-power bill. They differ only in this respect, that this touches the ownership of the Government in the adjacent lands, and a dam can not be constructed simply because the Government owns the land. In the other case it could not be constructed simply because the Government has authority to prevent obstructions in navigable streams.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for, and the next bill on the calendar will be stated.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 640) for the relief of Ellen B. Monahan was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. WORKS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

VILHELM TORKILDSEN.

The bill (S. 1326) for the relief of Vilhelm Torkildsen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out the figures "$19,813.14" and insert the figures "$13,561.88," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Vilhelm Torkildsen the sum of $13,561.88 as compensation for the injuries sustained by his vessel, the steamship Henrik Ibsen, while coaling war vessels of the United States of America in Panama Bay in December, 1908.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. GEORGE A. MILLER.

The bill (S. 142) for the relief of Mrs. George A. Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out the figures "$200" and insert the figures "$108.50," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $108.50 to Mrs. George A. Miller, on account of money expended by her husband in defending a suit brought against him growing out of his effort to enforce the law against selling liquor to Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill (H. R. 8493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 4, line 2, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Deborah Hart, widow of Jame S. Hart, late of Company B, Third Regiment Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia, and pay her a pension to the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 24, after the word "Volunteer," strike out "Cavalry" and insert "Infantry (First Cavalry)," and on page 5, line 2, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Maximillian Schneider, late of Company M, Twenty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry (First Cavalry), and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 8, after the word "Battalion," to insert "Eighteenth Regiment," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William Evans, late of Company C, First Battalion Eighteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 9, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Elizabeth Fry, widow of John T. S. Fry, late of Company C, Fortieth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 14, to strike out:

The name of William Holdridge, late of Company B, Ninth Regiment New York Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 1, before the words "per month," to strike out "$27" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Patrick Kenyon, late of Company E, Ninety-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 2, to strike out:

The name of Mabel F. Coen, widow of Charles G. Coen, late of Company D, Eleventh Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I have examined the report, and I can not find anything stated in the report to show why the Senate committee cut out this item.

The facts are briefly these: This woman was married to a soldier, who died in 1899. Then she got a pension as his widow for herself and a couple of minor children. In 1906 she thought she married a man by the name of Lattin, but it was found afterwards he already had a wife living from whom he had not been divorced. He brought suit against this woman for a divorce; and upon the advice of her attorney, from whom I have a letter, she filed a cross bill admitting the marriage and the legitimacy of the child that had been born to her from the last marriage. As a matter of fact, she was never married to the man Lattin, and the House committee in its report so finds. The House committee said that the widow is preeminently entitled to this relief.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to join in the views expressed by my colleague in this matter. I have a letter in regard to the case from the attorney who advised her to obtain a divorce from the man to whom she was never legally married and by whom she had been previously deceived. The attorney is a man in whom I have sufficient confidence to accept the statement he made in regard to her. He recommends her as being an exceedingly deserving woman, having lived an exemplary life and raised a large family of children. Except for the apparent second marriage, which was really no marriage at all, she would be entitled to this pension. Because she was deceived by the man with whom she went through the form of a marriage I think it would be no reason why she should be deprived of a pension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 10, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Perlia J. Wilcox, widow of Jeremiah C. Wilcox, late of Company H, Fifth Regiment Iowa Cavalry, and of the Sixth Regiment United States Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 2, before the words "per month," to strike out "$20" and insert "$12," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Elizabeth Gross, widow of Reuben Gross, late of Company A, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 14, to strike out:

The name of Ingalls Evans, late of Company K, Twelfth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 14, before the words "per month," to strike out "$36" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Benjamin E. Hoy, late of Company I, Forty-fifth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 9, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30"; so as to make the clause read:

The name of Nathaniel Patterson, la of Company F, Forty-seventh Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 21, to strike out:

The name of Joseph Coles, late of Company B, One hundredth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, after line 4, to strike out:

The name of Estella M. Howlett, former widow of George W. Baldwin, late of Company A, Third Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 15, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30"; so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 16, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20"; so as to make the clause read:

The name of Mary Marsh, widow of Edwin Marsh, late of Company K, Twenty-ninth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 19, before the words "per month," to strike out "$27" and insert "$36"; so as to make the clause read:

The name of George W. Johnston, late of Company E, Forty-fourth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 1, before the name "Garthwait," to strike out "Matthew" and insert "Mathew"; so as to make the clause read:

The name of Eliza A. Garthwait, widow of Mathew Garthwait, late of Twentieth Battery, Indiana Light Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 2, before the words "per month," to strike out "$30" and insert "$36," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Thomas Nichols, late of Company A, Eightieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 24, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William B. Rutledge, late of Company C, Eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, after line 15, to strike out:

The name of Annie Tompkins, widow of William M. Tompkins, late of Company C, One hundred and fifty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, after line 12, to strike out:

The name of Mary E. Clark, widow of Jerome B. Clark, late of Company F, First Regiment Connecticut Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I move, on page 3 of the bill, to strike out from line 3 to line 14 the three items there included.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 2, it is proposed to strike out the following items:

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

The bill (S. 665) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to publicity of contributions and expenditures made for the purpose of influencing the nomination and election of candidates for the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States, limiting the amount of campaign expenses, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

Mr. KERN. Was there an objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was.

Mr. KERN. May I inquire who objected?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah objected. I will state to the Senator that these bills would lead to long discussion, and I want to get through with the calendar.

Mr. KERN. I simply desired to know who made the objection.

CAMPAIGN FUNDS.

The bill (S. 669) to limit the use of campaign funds in presidential and national elections was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

RIGHT OF WAY NEAR ENGLE, N. MEX.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there a minority report on that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator know whether my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] has any objection to it?

Mr. CATRON. The Senator's colleague said that he would make no objection to it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he did not introduce a similar bill on the same subject in the last Congress?

Mr. CATRON. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was practically the same bill?

Mr. CATRON. It was the same bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill passed the Senate?

Mr. CATRON. It passed the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Why did it not become a law?

Mr. CATRON. It did not pass the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 1840) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891, and the acts amendatory thereto, approved February 21, 1893, June 27, 1898, and February 26, 1909, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN L. SEVY.

The bill (S. 31) for the relief of John L. Sevy was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue patent to John L. Sevy for the following-described lands: The south half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 12, township 36 south, range 8 west; the north half of lot 1, section 18, township 36 south, range 7 west; the south half of lot 3, section 12, township 36 south, range 8 west; the west half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 7, township 36 south, range 7 west; the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, section 7, the west half of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter and the northwest quarter of the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 17, township 36 south, range 7 west of Salt Lake meridian, situate in the Sevier National Forest, upon the transfer by the said John L. Sevy to the United States of the north half of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 12, township 36 south, range 8 west; the south half of lot 1 of section 13, township 36 south, range 8 west; the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 25, township 35 south, range 4 west; the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 17, township 36 south, range 3 west of Salt Lake meridian, situate in the Sevier and Powell National Forests: Provided, That upon the reconveyance of the surrendered lands they will become a part of the Sevier and Powell National Forests.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM G. WILLIAMS, SR.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of William G. Williams, sr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to allow William G. Williams, sr., to enter, under the homestead laws and subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof, lot 1 of section 2 and lots 1 and 2 of section 3, township 8 south, range 1 east, Salt Lake meridian, Salt Lake City, Utah, land district. But the entry and patent therefor shall expressly reserve to the United States the right to take or use, without compensation to entryman, patentee, or his assignees, any or all of the said land which may be actually needed for or in connection with the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Strawberry Valley reclamation project.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL M. FROST.

The bill (S. 33) for the relief of Daniel M. Frost was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes Daniel M. Frost to make a homestead entry for an unappropriated quarter section of public land, subject to said entry, as though his former entry No. 6595, Larned, Kans., series, had not been made.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to allow Frost credit for the residence and cultivation had by him in connection with said Larned entry, as though it were had on said second entry, when proof is submitted on the latter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TENNESSEE STATE CLAIMS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 37) to amend S. J. Res. 8, approved May 4, 1898, entitled "Joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States," was read.

Mr. GALLINGER. The only explanation of the joint resolution seems to be in the whereases. I wish to look into it a little and I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made and the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] asks that the joint resolution shall go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He does.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order that he may investigate it, as I understood the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I want to examine it a little.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to make a statement about the joint resolution, which I think will remove the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly will withdraw my objection to enable the Senator from Tennessee to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, this joint resolution was introduced in the last session of the last Congress and reported favorably by the Committee on Claims and passed by the Senate. It reached the House too late for disposition there. The present joint resolution is identical with the one which was then passed.

A brief history of it, without going into the merits, is as follows: The United States Treasury holds about $600,000 of the bonds of Tennessee that are now past due. The State of Tennessee claims to have some $500,000 of offset on account of the appropriation of certain railroad and other property during the war and certain other claims of smaller amounts.

This controversy has been in existence for quite a number of years. Some years ago a joint resolution was passed by Congress submitting the controversy to three commissioneers on the part of the United States, composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, and the General Assembly of Tennessee appointed to represent the State three other commissioners, Col. John J. Vertrees, of Nashville; Mr. John M. Hickey, of Mississippi; and Mr. Dabney M. Scales, of Memphis.

The commissioners have never been able to agree far enough to sufficiently get to the merits. In other words, the question is whether or not the fact that the State of Tennessee seceded would bar her from making the claim. The joint resolution simply proposes to direct those commissioners to proceed and find the facts and report to Congress.

The original joint resolution did not settle anything, but merely referred the matter to these commissioners to report the facts and the rights of the parties according to the respective equities. This direction is to go on to do that and leave the question of loyalty to be hereafter determined by Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? I did not quite understand who represents the Government in this matter.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Government is represented by the Attorney General, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the State of Tennessee has appointed three commissioners to confer with those three gentlemen?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And they are to report their findings to Congress?

Mr. SHIELDS. They are to report their findings to Congress. There is nothing binding in their agreement until it reaches Congress and is ratified.

Mr. GALLINGER. This matter has never been before a court for adjudication?

Mr. SHIELDS. It never has been in litigation at all, and this is a method provided to prevent litigation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee, I withdraw my objection. I thought this was a final adjudication, as I glanced at the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is withdrawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. As this matter is to be reported back to Congress, I shall make no objection.

Mr. SHIELDS. The whole matter is to be settled by Congress on the incoming of that report.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 2, to strike out lines 3 and 4, as follows:

That the said Senate joint resolution 8 be, and is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following, namely:

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States," approved May 12, 1898, be, and is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the end of the joint resolution, on page 3, line 8, after the word "parties," to insert "The said compromise or settlement is not to be effective or final until approved by Congress," so as to read:

The claims of the parties respectively shall be considered, adjusted, and settled on their merits without regard to any question of loyalty or disloyalty, and upon such terms as to amounts, allowance of interest, etc., as shall do equal and impartial justice to the parties. The said compromise or settlement is not to be effective or final until approved by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments to the preamble will now be considered.

The first amendment to the preamble was on page 1, in the first line, after the words "Whereas the," to strike out "resolution in the caption mentioned, being Senate joint resolution 8, approved May 4, 1898," and to insert "joint resolution entitled 'a joint resolution'"; in the fourth line, after the words "State of," to strike out "Tennessee," and to insert "Tennessee, approved May 12, 1898," so as to make the clause read:

Whereas the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States and of the State of Tennessee," approved May 12, 1898, provides that the Attorney General, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War of the United States, as representatives of the United States, and agents or commissioners to be appointed by the State of Tennessee, as representatives of the State, shall proceed by conference to compromise, adjust, and settle the claims in the resolution mentioned, but that the compromise or settlement shall not be effective as final until approved by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment to the preamble was, on page 2, in the second clause, fifth line, after the word "said," to strike out "S. J. Res. 8" and to insert "resolution," so as to make the clause read:

Whereas at conference held between said representatives they have been unable to proceed because the said representatives of the United States have insisted that the settlement or compromise of the claims of the State of Tennessee under said resolution should be precluded by the consideration that the State of Tennessee was, during the Civil War, in the resolution mentioned, a public enemy and in rebellion, and not entitled to compensation for any losses suffered by reason of the action of the United States in suppressing such rebellion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble as amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if he has any objection to striking out the preamble to the joint resolution? The preamble recites matters that ought to be recited in a report, and their inclusion makes the joint resolution very awkward.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought the preamble, to some extent, clarified the matter. This joint resolution was prepared by Col. John J. Vertrees, of Nashville, one of our most distinguished lawyers, and then submitted here to the Attorney General. I discussed the joint resolution with the Attorney General before I introduced it. The preamble, of course, does not settle anything.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but it is a mere declaration which ought to have been put into a report. I will move to strike out the preamble, and the Senate can do what it pleases about it. In the preamble this statement is found:

Whereas it is not deemed just that the consideration of the claims of Tennessee should or can be precluded or the same disallowed upon the ground that the State was a public enemy and in rebellion.

That is an argument on one side of this question which is now going to commissioners, so I have moved to strike out the preamble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to strike out the preamble.

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand that the Senator's objection is to the last paragraph of the preamble?

Mr. GALLINGER. That language caught my eye, and I thought it was a very serious matter to make an argument in a preamble on one side of a controversy. I think the Senator from Tennessee ought to agree that the entire preamble should go out. The facts which are recited in the preamble can be submitted to the commissioners.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that if it is only the last paragraph of the preamble, making that statement to which he objects, he can confine his motion to striking out that language, because the preamble contains some reference to former resolutions in other portions of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, let the last paragraph of the preamble be stricken out, and I will raise no further objection if the Senator from Tennessee thinks the remainder of the preamble ought to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire is to strike out the last paragraph of the preamble, which he has stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to strike out the last paragraph of the preamble, which I have read.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the preamble as amended.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to amend a joint resolution entitled 'A joint resolution providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims against the United States,' approved May 12, 1898."

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to return to calendar No. 42, being Senate bill 1878. The bill was disposed of without disposition having been made of an amendment that was pending, which I had offered on the 15th of February.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That matter can be brought up, as the Chair thinks, on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill referred to by him was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1878) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section No. 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I offer the amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to the bill, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert:

To Prairie County, Ark., $13,200.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to say, in explanation of my action in offering that amendment at this time, that that amount was adjudicated in favor of Prairie County, Ark., one of the oldest counties of the State in point of organization. The court found the jail and courthouse at that place had been demolished by the Federal authorities during their occupancy of that vicinity and devoted to purposes of the Army, and that the reasonable value of the materials taken and converted to public use was $13,200. The court found that the county was not at all times loyal to the Union. That, of course, is a conclusion of law. As a matter of fact, that particular part of Arkansas fell under the jurisdiction of the Federal forces in December, 1863. An independent State government was organized early in 1864, a legislature created, and a representative from that county sat in the loyal legislature for some months before this destruction took place. The territory was in control of the Federal forces at the time the materials out of which the courthouse and jail were constructed were taken and devoted to Federal use. Of course, the county was carried out of the Union with the State by the adoption of the secession ordinance, and until it was brought under Federal jurisdiction, in the latter part of 1863, I take it for granted that its character was fixed by the sovereignty that assumed to administer affairs there up to that time; but for many months before the destruction of the courthouse and jail took place the county had been under Federal jurisdiction, a loyal State government was administering affairs therein, loyal officers served, and a loyal member from the county sat in the so-called loyal legislature. That legislature voted for the ratification of the thirteenth amendment before this destruction took place. So there is not any reason for saying that the county was disloyal at that time. The court does not say so. The court says it was not during the entire Civil War loyal to the United States Government.

If that is true, it is a conclusion of law. During the time it was controlled by the Confederate forces, we may well assume that its character was fixed by that condition; but when it passed under the control of that part of the State which for months had been, and up to this minute has been, under the control of the loyal authorities, there was not any reason for saying that the county was not loyal because it took its character from the State government that was being administered therein. There is not any reason for saying that the county as an organization was disloyal when its character was otherwise fixed by its participation in the affairs of the Union, and did not thereafter lend any aid or comfort to the Confederate cause.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very gladly.

Mr. GRONNA. May I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas whether the amount proposed to be paid under the claim which is offered as an amendment goes to the county or to an individual?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It goes to the county of Prairie.

Mr. GRONNA. I am a member of the Committee on Claims, and I do not recollect that we ever had an opportunity to examine the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The claim is supported by a judgment of the Court of Claims, reported to Congress on the 11th day of January, 1913. It contains this statement:

Prairie County was not loyal to the Government of the United States during the whole Civil War.

And that is literally true; but at the time this destruction and appropriation took place it was a part of the territory over which a loyal State government was administering affairs, and it was not in a hostile country at the time the destruction took place.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator says a "judgment of the Court of Claims." Does he mean a judgment or a statement of the court?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is a finding by the Court of Claims.

Mr. WARREN. A finding; and the amount is what?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The amount is $13,200, which is the value of the material taken. Of course, the courthouse and jail were worth very much more than that, but the material devoted to the uses of the Government was found by the court to have a value of $13,200.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS (S. DOC. NO. 350).

The resolution (S. Res. 83) submitted by Mr. FLETCHER on January 28, 1916, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on January 13, 1916, entitled "A National System of Highways and Landscape Designing," being an address delivered before the American Civic Association of Washington, D. C., on December 31, 1915, by Cyrus Kehr, of Knoxville, Tenn., be printed as a Senate document.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1082) to prevent the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JAMES. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ISSUANCE OF DUPLICATE CHECKS.

The bill (H. R. 3636) to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as reenacted and amended by act of February 23, 1909, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3646. That whenever any original check is lost, stolen, or destroyed disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, within three years from the date of such check, to issue a duplicate check under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bond, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, and proof of loss of original check as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That whenever any original check or warrant of the Post Office Department has been lost, stolen, or destroyed the Postmaster General may authorize the issuance of a duplicate thereof at any time within three years from the date of such original check or warrant upon the execution by the owner thereof of such bond of indemnity as the Postmaster General may prescribe: Provided further, That when such original check or warrant does not exceed in amount the sum of $50 and the payee or owner is, at the date of the application, an officer or employee in the service of the Post Office Department, whether by contract, designation, or appointment, the Postmaster General may, in lieu of an indemnity bond, authorize the issuance of a duplicate check or warrant upon such an affidavit as he may prescribe, to be made before any postmaster by the payee or owner of an original check or warrant."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2730) to fix the compensation of assistant appraisers of merchandise, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 703) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to speak upon that bill, so that it will be impossible for it to pass at this time, and as a friend of the measure I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ELDREDGE BROS. LIVE STOCK CO.

The bill (S. 53) for the relief of the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to refund to the Eldredge Bros. Live Stock Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Utah, $2,738.73 and pay to the corporation that amount on account of duties collected on cattle temporarily driven into the United States from Canada.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUNDING OF MONEYS ILLEGALLY ASSESSED.

The bill (S. 54) to provide for the refunding of certain moneys illegally assessed and collected in the district of Utah was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate to the corporations hereinafter named the amounts respectively placed opposite their names, such amounts having been illegally assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and collected by the collector of internal revenue for the district of Utah in 1879 as a tax on notes used for circulation and paid out, such tax having been held illegal by the Supreme Court of the United States: Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution, of Bountiful, Utah, $123.30; Logan Branch of Zion's Cooperative Mercantile Institution, of Logan, Utah, $4,852.42.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETIREMENT OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The bill (S. 1162) to place certain officers of the Army on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope that the Senator will not ask that that bill go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that bill can not be disposed of without considerable discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator that when the calendar was called once before the only objection made to the bill was that it was general in its terms. That objection was made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. With that objection removed, as it can be removed by a very simple amendment, I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will prepare the amendment and let me see it—I am looking after it for the Senator from Florida—we may be able to go back to the bill, but I know the Senator from Florida objected very seriously to it on a previous occasion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator makes the objection himself, that is all right, but if he is acting——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I make the objection in the absence of the Senator from Florida, unless we can adjust the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it will go over.

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 7) providing that any Senator upon his own request may be recorded and counted as present in order to constitute a quorum, was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 649) making appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to reappropriate the unexpended balance of the appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington, being $831.59, together with the further sum of $668.41, to enable the Secretary of State to pay to any secretary to the counsel of the United States, as remuneration for services rendered by him in the preparation and trial of the case of the United States at Geneva, such sum, if any, as remains due and unpaid of the amount directed by Secretary Fish to be allowed as compensation to each of the secretaries to the counsel of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that bill had better go over. I do not understand it. I think it should have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill passed the Senate at the last session. The amount involved is very small—only a thousand dollars, I think, or thereabouts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ought not the bill to have been referred to the Appropriation Committee? Has the Senator looked into it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I have looked into it very carefully.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. An appropriation was made really, but the money was not paid out.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEMNITIES TO AUSTRIA-HUNGARY, GREECE, AND TURKEY.

The bill (S. 3080) to authorize the payment of indemnities to the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey for injuries inflicted on their nationals during riots occurring in South Omaha, Nebr., February 21, 1909, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, on page 2, line 7, after the word "all," to strike out "$41,230" and insert "$41,030," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as a matter of grace and without reference to the question of liability therefor, to the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey, as full indemnity on account of injuries inflicted on their nationals during riots which occurred in South Omaha, Nebr., on February 21, 1909, as set forth in the message of the President of the United States, dated January 14, 1916, with accompanying papers (H. Doc. No. 576, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), as follows: To the Government of Austria-Hungary, $800; to the Government of Greece, $40,000; and to the Government of Turkey, $230; in all, $41,030.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossd for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OTTAWA INDIAN TRIBE OF BLANCHARDS FORK.

The bill (S. 138) for the relief of the Ottawa Indian Tribe of Blanchards Fork and Roche de Bœuf, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to consider and determine all legal and equitable claims, if any, of the Indian tribe of Blanchards Fork and Roche de Bœuf against the United States for the misappropriation of any funds of the tribe or for the failure of the United States to pay the tribe any money due under any treaty, and also to consider and determine any legal or equitable defenses, set-offs, or counterclaims which the United States may have against the said tribe of Indians, and to enter judgment thereon, all claims and defenses to be considered without regard to lapse of time, and the final judgment and satisfaction thereof shall be a full and final settlement of all claims of said Indians against the United States.

SEC. 2. That suit under this act shall be begun by the filing of a single petition setting forth the claims of Indians, to be verified by an attorney or attorneys selected by the claimant Indians, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as provided by existing law. The Indian tribe of Blanchards Fork and Roche de Bœuf shall be party plaintiff and the United States party defendant, and such suit shall, on motion of either party, be advanced on the docket of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence. The compensation to be paid the attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Court of Claims, but in any event shall not be greater than that provided in the contract between the claimant Indians and their attorney or attorneys, and shall be paid out of any sum or sums found and adjudged to be due said Indians.

SEC. 3. That the balance of any judgment rendered in favor of claimant Indians may be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians entitled thereto, and shall draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, or may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be deposited in such bonded bank or banks as the Secretary may select, and under such regulations as he may prescribe, and said principal and interest may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be paid to the Indians or expended for their benefit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the Ottawa Indian Tribe of Blanchards Fork and Roche de Bœuf."

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 20) for the appointment of a committee of Senators to examine into questions relating to the acquisition or construction of manufacturing plants to supply the Army and Navy with arms, armament, etc., was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION ROUTES TO THE SEABOARD.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 81) authorizing the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard to employ an additional clerk, etc., which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment on page 1, lines 3 and 4, to strike out "the balance of the present fiscal year," and insert "two months," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be authorized to employ an additional clerk at a salary of $100 per month for two months, the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CLERK, COMMITTEE ON THE CENSUS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 82) authorizing the Committee on the Census to employ an additional clerk temporarily, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment, on page 1, line 2, after the words "rate of," to strike out "$120" and insert "$100," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Census be authorized to employ an assistant clerk at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate for a period not exceeding two months.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY.

The resolution (S. Res. 89) submitted by Mr. NEWLANDS on February 3 (calendar day, February 4), 1916, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The resolution (S. Res. 90) submitted by Mr. NEWLANDS on the 9th instant was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fourth Congress to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

COAST GUARD CUTTERS.

The bill (S. 2719) providing for the purchase or construction of cutters for the Coast Guard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to construct and equip two steam Coast Guard cutters for service on the Pacific coast and in Alaskan waters, at a total cost not to exceed $700,000; one steam Coast Guard cutter for service as an anchorage patrol boat in New York Harbor, at a cost not to exceed $125,000, such vessel to be especially constructed for ice breaking; to purchase or construct and equip two or more cutters for service in harbors and shoal waters, at a total cost not to exceed $50,000; to purchase or construct and equip three light-draft river steamboats, including lifeboats and such other life-saving appliances and equipment as may be necessary, to be used in rescuing lives and property and in distributing food and clothing to marooned people during flood times on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers and their tributaries, for patrolling those waters for the enforcement of navigation and motor-boat laws, and for rendering aid to vessels in distress, at a total cost not to exceed $240,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1222) to amend section 4464 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order, and the Secretary read the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects. The bill goes over.

HENRY O. SLAYTON.

The bill (S. 1259) to restore to the active list First Lieut. of Engineers Henry O. Slayton, retired, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in line 5, before the name "Henry," to strike out "Revenue-Cutter Service" and insert "Coast Guard," and in line 6, after the words "United States," to strike out "Revenue-Cutter Service" and insert "Coast Guard," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the active list of the Coast Guard, Henry O. Slayton, first lieutenant of engineers, United States Coast Guard, retired, as an extra number, to take rank as No. 18 on the list of first lieutenants of engineers: Provided, That said Henry O. Slayton is found physically fit for active duty by a medical board appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to restore to the active list First Lieut. Henry O. Slayton, retired, United States Coast Guard."

FREDERICK J. BIRKETT.

The bill (S. 1460) to reinstate Frederick J. Birkett as third lieutenant in the United States Revenue-Cutter Service was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "the United States," to strike out "Revenue-Cutter Service" and insert "Coast Guard," and in line 7, after the word "States," to strike out "Revenue-Cutter Service" and insert "Coast Guard," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint as a third lieutenant in the United States Coast Guard Frederick J. Birkett, formerly third lieutenant in the United States Coast Guard, and who voluntarily resigned from such service on October 8, 1913: Provided, That this apointment shall not be made until the said Birkett shall have passed a satisfactory physical examination before a board of surgeons of the United States Public Health Service.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to reinstate Frederick J. Birkett as third lieutenant in the United States Coast Guard."

STEAM PRESSURE ON BOILERS IN STEAM VESSELS.

The bill (S. 1225) to amend section 4433 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to working steam pressure allowable on boilers in steam vessels, and section 4418 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to hydrostatic test of steam boilers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4433 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4433. The working steam pressure allowable on all boilers inspected as required by Title LII shall be determined by the rules of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce."

SEC. 2. That section 4418 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, be and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4418. The local inspectors shall also inspect the boilers and their appurtenances in all steam vessels before the same shall be used, and once at least in every year thereafter, and shall subject all boilers to the hydrostatic pressure. All such vessels shall comply with the following requirements, namely: That the boilers are well made, of good and suitable material; that the openings for the passage of water and steam, respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat, are of proper dimensions, and free from obstructions; that the spaces between and around the flues are sufficient; that flues, boilers, furnaces, safety valves, fusible plugs, low-water indicators, feed-water apparatus, gauge cocks, steam gauges, water and steam pipes connecting boilers, means of prevention of sparks and flames from fire doors, low-water gauges, means of removing mud and sediment from boilers, and all other such machinery and appurtenances thereof, are of such construction, shape, condition, arrangement, and material that the same may be safely employed in the service proposed without peril to life; and the local inspectors shall satisfy themselves by thorough examination that said requirements of law and regulations in regard thereto have been fully complied with. All boilers used on steam vessels and inspected as required by Title LII shall be subjected to such hydrostatic test as shall be determined by the rules of the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce. No boiler, flue, or pipe, nor any of the connections therewith shall be approved which is made in whole or in part of bad material, or is unsafe in its form, or dangerous from defective workmanship, age, use, or other cause."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHILOCCO INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (S. 1099) to authorize the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. to change its line of railroad through the Chilocco Indian Reservation, State of Oklahoma, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. to reconstruct its line of railroad through the Chilocco Indian Reservation in the State of Oklahoma to eliminate, where necessary, existing heavy grades and curves, and for such purpose to acquire the necessary right of way, not exceeding 250 feet in width, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and to the payment for the land so taken and occupied by such new right of way of such an amount as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior to be fair and adequate compensation therefor, including all damages which may be caused by the reconstruction of said line of railroad to adjoining lands, crops, and other improvements, said amount to be paid to the Secretary of the Interior for the use and benefit of the Chilocco Indian School.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANUFACTURE OF ARMOR.

The bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill is the unfinished business. By virtue of the unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate, it will be temporarily laid aside.

BILL PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1428) to reimburse certain fire insurance companies the amounts paid by them for property destroyed by fire in suppressing the bubonic plague in the Territory of Hawaii in the years 1899 and 1900, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

SISSETON AND WAHPETON BANDS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The bill (S. 585) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians may have or claim to have against the United States shall be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for the amount due or claimed to be due said bands from the United States under any treaties or laws of Congress; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine all claims of said bands against the United States and also any legal or equitable defense, set-off, or counterclaim which the United States may have against said Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians, and to enter judgment, and in determining the amount to be entered herein the court shall deduct from any sums found due said Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians any and all gratuities paid said bands or individual members thereof subsequent to March 3, 1863: Provided, That in determining the amount to be entered herein, the value of the land involved shall not exceed the value of such land on March 3, 1863. If any such question is submitted to said court it shall settle the rights, both legal and equitable, of said bands of Indians and the United States, notwithstanding lapse of time or statute of limitations. Such action in the Court of Claims shall be presented by a single petition, to be filed within one year after the passage of this act, making the United States a party defendant, which shall set forth all the facts on which the said bands of Indians base their claims for recovery; and the said petition may be verified by the agent or authorized attorney or attorneys of said bands, to be selected by said bands and employed under contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of existing law, upon information or belief as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements or verifications shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, reports, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used as evidence. Whatever moneys may be found due the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Indians under the provisions of this act, less attorney's fees, shall be placed to their credit in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the compensation to be paid the attorney or attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, but in any event shall not be greater than the amount named in the approved contract: Provided further, That such compensation shall in no event exceed $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK PAYNE SELBY.

The bill (S. 2720) for the relief of Frank Payne Selby was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$2,530.80," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Payne Selby, $2,530.80, as full compensation to said Frank Payne Selby for the loss of a foot, which occurred as the result of an accident, without negligence on his part, while he was engaged in the performance of his duties as conductor of a dirt train on the Panama Canal excavation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN ALEXANDER BESONEN.

The bill (S. 3436) for the relief of John Alexander Besonen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John Alexander Besonen, of the county of Marquette, State of Michigan, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $297.27, in compliance with the findings of the Court of Claims, Senate Document No. 711, Sixtieth Congress, second session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. On page 15, I move to strike out the provision relative to Mary C. Schellner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, it is proposed to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, in the following words:

The name of Mary C. Schellner, widow of Charles S. Schellner, late of Company I, One hundred and fifty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABRAM H. JOHNSON.

The bill (S. 2564) correcting the military record of Abram H. Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Abram H. Johnson, who was a corporal of Company K, Third Michigan Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment March 18, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Abram H. Johnson."

JOHN H. ARMSTRONG.

The bill (S. 741) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John H. Armstrong was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I think unintentionally, objected to the passage of Senate bill 741. I ask that the Chair return to that bill. It is No. 121 on the calendar. It has been favorably reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and that fact ought to be sufficient for its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from New Hampshire insists upon his objection, the bill can not be considered to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not insist upon my objection. The Senator from Michigan has explained to me a matter in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will return to Order of Business No. 121, then.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John H. Armstrong, late of Battery A, Third Regiment Rhode Island Volunteer Artillery, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment, provided that other than as above set forth no pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of John H. Armstrong."

REVISION OF THE ARTICLES OF WAR.

The bill (S. 3191) to amend section 1342 and chapter 6, Title XIV, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, but before the reading was concluded—

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will interrupt the reading for the purpose of asking Senators who are much better informed in military matters than I am whether this is a bill that has been well considered and has been agreed to by military authorities?

Mr. WARREN. It has been very well considered, not only at this session but at the last session, and passed the Senate, but failed to get action in the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a very long bill, and I made the inquiry for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, the request of the Senator from New Hampshire will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the amendments proposed by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was under the subhead "D, Procedure," on page 9, line 2, after the word "proceedings," to strike out the semicolon and insert: "The accused shall enjoy the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defense," and in line 4, after the word "should," to strike out "the accused" and insert "he, for any reason"; so as to make article 17 read:

ART. 17. Judge advocate to prosecute.—The judge advocate of a general or special court-martial shall prosecute in the name of the United States, and shall, under the direction of the court, prepare the record of its proceedings. The accused shall enjoy the right to have the assistance of counsel for his defense, but should he, for any reason, be unrepresented by counsel, the judge advocate shall from time to time throughout the proceedings advise the accused of his legal rights.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 14, after "Art. 19," to strike out "oaths of members and judge advocates" and insert "oaths"; so as to make article 19 read:

ART. 19. Oaths.—The judge advocate of a general or special court-martial shall administer to the members of the court, before they proceed upon any trial, the following oath or affirmation: "You, A. B., do swear (or affirm) that you will well and truly try and determine, according to the evidence, the matter now before you, between the United States of America and the person to be tried, and that you will duly administer justice, without partiality, favor, or affection, according to the provisions of the rules and articles for the government of the Armies of the United States, and if any doubt should arise, not explained by said articles, then according to your conscience, the best of your understanding, and the custom of war in like cases; and you do further swear (or affirm) that you will not divulge the findings or sentence of the court until they shall be published by the proper authority, except to the judge advocate and assistant judge advocate; neither will you disclose or discover the vote or opinion of any particular member of the court-martial, unless required to give evidence thereof as a witness by a court of justice in due course of law. So help you God."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 18, to insert:

All persons who give evidence before a court-martial shall be examined on oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that the evidence you shall give in the case now in hearing shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 27, to insert:

Every reporter of the proceedings of a court-martial shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that you will faithfully perform the duties of reporter to this court. So help you God."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 3, to insert:

Every interpreter in the trial of any case before a court-martial shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that you will truly interpret in the case now in hearing. So help you God."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 11, to strike out "shall" and insert "may," so as to make article 20 read:

ART. 20. Continuances.—A court-martial may, for reasonable cause, grant a continuance to either party for such time and as often as may appear to be just.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 12, to strike out article 23, as follows:

ART. 23. Oath of witnesses.—All persons who give evidence before a court-martial shall be examined on oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that the evidence you shall give in the case now in hearing shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God."

In the case of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The sections will be renumbered in accordance with the amendments which have been adopted.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 17, to insert:

ART. 27. Courts of inquiry—Records of, when admissible.—The record of the proceeding of a court of inquiry may be read in evidence before any court-martial or military commission in any case not capital nor extending to the dismissal of an officer, and may also be read in evidence in any proceeding before a court of inquiry or a military board: Provided, That such evidence may be adduced by the defense in capital cases or cases extending to the dismissal of an officer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 10, after the word "who," to strike out "quits the organization to which he properly belongs and, without having first received a regular discharge from such organization, enlists in any other organization of," and insert "without having first received a regular discharge, again enlists in"; in line 14, after the word "or," to insert "in the"; in line 16, after the words "United States," to insert "or in any foreign army"; in line 18, after the word "and," to insert "where the enlistment is in one of the forces of the United States mentioned above"; and in line 19, after the word "enlisted," to insert "therein," so as to make the clause read:

ART. 29. Enlistment without discharge—Any soldier who without having first received a regular discharge again enlists in the Army, or in the Militia when in the service of the United States, or in the Navy or Marine Corps of the United States, or in any foreign army, shall be deemed to have deserted the service of the United States; and where the enlistment is in one of the forces of the United States mentioned above, to have fraudulently enlisted therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 20, to strike out:

ART. 30. Oaths of reporters and interpreters.—Every reporter of the proceedings of a court-martial shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that you will faithfully perform the duties of reporter to this court. So help you God."

And every interpreter in the trial of any case before a court-martial shall, before entering upon his duties, make oath or affirmation in the following form: "You swear (or affirm) that you will truly interpret in the case now in hearing. So help you God."

In case of affirmation the closing sentence of adjuration will be omitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 3, to insert:

ART. 38. President may prescribe rules.—The President may by regulations, which he may modify from time to time, prescribe the procedure, including modes of proof, in cases before courts-martial, courts of inquiry, military commissions, and other military tribunals: Provided, That nothing contrary to or inconsistent with these articles shall be so prescribed: Provided further, That all rules made in pursuance of this article shall be laid before the Congress annually.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the subhead "E. Limitations upon prosecutions," on page 19, line 19, after the word "any," to strike out "noncapital"; in line 20, after the word "articles," to strike out "ninety-two" and insert "ninety-three"; and in line 21, before the words "of this code," to strike out "ninety-three" and insert "ninety-four," so as to make article 39 read:

ART. 39. As to time.—Except for desertion committed in time of war, or for murder, no person subject to military law shall be liable to be tried or punished by a court-martial for any crime or offense committed more than two years before the arraignment of such person: Provided, That for desertion in time of peace or for any crime or offense punishable under articles 93 and 94 of this code the period of limitations upon trial and punishment by court-martial shall be three years: Provided further, That the period of any absence of the accused from the jurisdiction of the United States, and also any period during which by reason of some manifest impediment the accused shall not have been amenable to military justice, shall be excluded in computing the aforesaid periods of limitation: And provided further, That this article shall not have the effect to authorize the trial or punishment for any crime or offense barred by the provisions of existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "G. Action by appointing or superior authority," on page 22, line 17, after the word "guilt," to insert "and"; in line 19, after the words "part of the," to strike out "sentence; and" and insert "sentence"; and after line 19 to strike out "(c) The power to change the sequence in which a sentence as adjudged by the court may require the execution of the punishments of dishonorable discharge and confinement," so as to make article 47 read:

ART. 47. Powers incident to power to approve.—The power to approve the sentence of a court-martial shall be held to include, inter alia:

(a) The power to approve or disapprove a finding and to approve only so much of a finding of guilty of a particular offense as involves a finding of guilty of a lesser included offense when, in the opinion of the authority having power to approve, the evidence of record requires a finding of only the lesser degree of guilt; and

(b) The power to approve or disapprove the whole or any part of the sentence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "III. Punitive articles," subhead "D. Arrest; Confinement," on page 32, after line 6, to strike out:

ART. 70. Investigation of and action upon charges.—The charge against any person placed in arrest or confinement shall be investigated promptly by the commanding officer or other proper military authority, and immediate steps shall be taken to try and punish the person accused or to dismiss the charges against him and release him from arrest or confinement. Any officer who is responsible for unreasonable or unnecessary delay in carrying the case to a final conclusion shall be punished as a court-martial may direct: Provided, That in time of peace no person shall, against his objection, be brought to trial before a general court-martial within a period of five days subsequent to the service of charges upon him. The accused shall be furnished a copy of the charges against him on his request therefor.

And insert:

ART. 70. Investigation of and action upon charges.—The charge against any person placed in arrest or confinement shall be investigated promptly by the commanding officer or other proper military authority, and immediate steps shall be taken to try and punish the person accused or to dismiss the charges against him and release him from arrest or confinement. In every case where a person remains in military custody for more than eight days without being served with charges upon which he is to be tried a special report of the necessity for the delay shall be made by his commanding officer in the manner prescribed by regulations, and a similar report shall be forwarded every eight days thereafter until charges are served or until such person is released from custody; and if the person remains in military custody for more than 30 days without being brought before a court-martial for trial, the authority responsible for bringing him to trial shall render to superior authority a special report of the necessity for the delay. Any officer whose duty it is to make such investigation or to take such steps or to render such report who willfully or negligently fails to do so promptly, and any officer who is responsible for unreasonable or unnecessary delay in carrying the case to a final conclusion shall be punished as a court-martial may direct: Provided, That in time of peace no person shall, against his objection, be brought to trial before a general court-martial within a period of five days subsequent to the service of charges upon him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "F. Miscellaneous crimes and offenses," on page 40, line 21, after the words "one hundred and," to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to make article 89 read:

ART. 89. Good order to be maintained and wrongs redressed.—All persons subject to military law are to behave themselves orderly in quarters, garrison, camp, and on the march; and any person subject to military law who commits any waste or spoil, or willfully destroys any property whatsoever (unless by order of his commanding officer), or commits any kind of depredation or riot shall be punished as a court-martial may direct. Any commanding officer who, upon complaint made to him, refuses or omits to see reparation made to the party injured, in so far as the offender's pay shall go toward such reparation, as provided for in article 105, shall be dismissed from the service, or otherwise punished, as a court-martial may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 4, after the subhead "Dueling," to insert "Attempts to commit suicide," and in line 9, after the word "authority," to insert "or who attempts to commit suicide," so as to make article 91 read:

ART. 91. Dueling—Attempts to commit suicide.—Any person subject to military law who fights or promotes or is concerned in or connives at fighting a duel, or who having knowledge of a challenge sent or about to be sent fails to report the fact promptly to the proper authority or who attempts to commit suicide shall, if an officer, be dismissed from the service or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct; and if any other person subject to military law, shall suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 13, to strike out lines 14 to 24, both inclusive, in the following words:

ART. 92. Various crimes.—Larceny, embezzlement, forgery, robbery, burglary, arson, mayhem, manslaughter, murder, assault with intent to kill or to do bodily harm, wounding by shooting or stabbing with an intent to commit murder, rape or assault with intent to commit rape, shall be punishable by a general court-martial when committed by persons subject to military law, and the punishment in any such case shall not be less than the punishment provided for the like offense by the laws of the State, Territory, District, or other place in which such offense may have been committed.

And to insert:

ART. 92. Murder—Rape.—Any person subject to military law who commits murder or rape shall suffer death or imprisonment for life, as a court-martial may direct; but no person shall be tried by court-martial for murder or rape committed within the geographical limits of the States of the Union and the District of Columbia in time of peace.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 6, to insert:

ART. 93. Various crimes.—Any person subject to military law who commits manslaughter, mayhem, arson, burglary, robbery, larceny, embezzlement, perjury, assault with intent to commit any felony, or assault with intent to do bodily harm, shall be punished as a court-martial may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "V. Miscellaneous provisions," on page 51, line 24, to strike out "95" and insert "96"; in line 25, to strike out "3" and insert "4"; and in the same line to strike out "8" and insert "9," so as to make article 110 read:

ART. 110. Certain articles to be read and explained.—Articles 1, 2, and 29, 54 to 96, inclusive, and 104 to 109, inclusive, shall be read and explained to every soldier at the time of his enlistment or muster in, or within six days thereafter, and shall be read and explained once every six months to the soldiers of every garrison, regiment, or company in the service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 14, after the word "administration," to insert:

And in foreign places where the Army may be serving shall have the general powers of a notary public or of a consul of the United States in the administration of oaths, the execution and acknowledgment of legal instruments, the attestation of documents, and all other forms of notarial acts to be executed by person subject to military law.

So as to make article 114 read:

ART. 114. Authority to administer oaths.—Any judge advocate or acting judge advocate, the president of a general or special court-martial, any summary court-martial, the judge advocate or any assistant judge advocate of a general or special court-martial, the president or the recorder of a court of inquiry or of a military board, any officer designated to take a deposition, any officer detailed to conduct an investigation, and the adjutant of any command shall have power to administer oaths for the purposes of the administration of military justice and for other purposes of military administration; and in foreign places where the Army may be serving shall have the general powers of a notary public or of a consul of the United States in the administration of oaths, the execution and acknowledgment of legal instruments, the attestation of documents, and all other forms of notarial acts to be executed by persons subject to military law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 23, after the word "Volunteers," to strike out "Officers," and insert:

That in time of war or public danger, when two or more officers of the same grade are on duty in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of any organization thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade. In the absence of such assignment by the President, officers—

So as to make article 119 read:

ART. 119. Rank and precedence among regulars, militia, and volunteers.—That in time of war or public danger, when two or more officers of the same grade are on duty in the same field, department, or command, or of organizations thereof, the President may assign the command of the forces of such field, department, or command, or of any organization thereof, without regard to seniority of rank in the same grade. In the absence of such assignment by the President, officers of the same grade shall rank and have precedence in the following order, without regard to date of rank or commission as between officers of different classes, namely: First, officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Marine Corps detached for service with the Army by order of the President; second, officers of the Organized Militia in the service of the United States; and, third, officers of the volunteer forces: Provided, That officers of the Regular Army holding commissions in the Organized Militia in the service of the United States or in the volunteer forces shall rank and have precedence under said commissions as if they were commissions in the Regular Army; but the rank of officers of the Regular Army under their commissions in the Organized Militia shall not, for the purposes of this article, be held to antedate muster into the service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 58, line 8, after the word "six," to strike out "and"; in line 9, after the word "and" the second time it occurs, to insert "by the Act of"; and in line 15, after the word "That," to strike out "in addition to the acting judge advocates now authorized by law, acting judge advocates may be detailed to assist judge advocates of geographical departments and tactical divisions, and when not immediately required for service with geographical departments or tactical divisions all acting judge advocates may be assigned to such other legal duty as the exigencies of the service may require" and insert "acting judge advocates may be detailed for separate brigades and other separate general court-martial jurisdiction, and when not immediately required for service with the geographical department, tactical division, separate brigade, or other separate general court-martial jurisdictions, acting judge advocates may be assigned to such other legal duty as the exigencies of the service may require, so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That hereafter the provisions of section 26 of the act of February 2, 1901, as modified for the Ordnance Department by section 2 of the act of June 25, 1906, by act of March 3, 1909, and by the act of February 24, 1915, shall be held to include the Judge Advocate General's Department: Provided, That the board of officers which is to recommend officers for detail in the Judge Advocate General's Department shall be composed of officers of that department: Provided further, That acting judge advocates may be detailed for separate brigades and other separate general court-martial jurisdiction, and when not immediately required for service with the geographical department, tactical division, separate brigade, or other separate general court-martial jurisdictions, acting judge advocates may be assigned to such other legal duty as the exigencies of the service may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in subsection (d), on page 60, line 3, after the word "approved," to strike out "July" and insert "June"; so as to make subsection (d) read:

(d) Sections 1 and 4 of an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to promote the administration of justice in the Army,' approved October 1, 1890, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1898.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 9, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Mary J. Fruit, former widow of William L. Fruit, late of Company C, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 23, to strike out:

The name of Mahala Burns, former widow of John T. Montgomery, late of Company C, Fourth Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 12, before the words "per month," to strike out "$20" and insert "$12," and in the same line, after the word "month," to strike out "in lieu of that she is now receiving," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Sarah A. Touseul, now Cardwell, former widow of Charles J. Touseul, late of Battery H, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 13, to strike out:

The name of Anna M. Jenkine, former widow of Joel N. Camp, late of Company B, Twenty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "of Companies" and insert "Company," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Margaret M. Hack, widow of George A. Hack, late of Company E, One hundred and thirty-third Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and Company F, Twenty-sixth and Twenty-seventh Regiments, United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 9, before the words "per month," to strike out "$27" and insert "$30," so as to make the clause read:

The name of James R. Parker, late of Company D, Twenty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 20, before the word "child," to strike out "defendant" and insert "dependent," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Arzila Wolf, helpless and dependent child of John Wolf, late of Company F, Thirty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 8, to strike out:

The name of Elvira Russell, former widow of George Vandruff, late of Company E, Forty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 20, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Maria W. Wilson, widow of George E. Wilson, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 18, after the word "musician," to strike out "of" and insert "band," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Ellen Carr, widow of Thomas Carr, late musician, band, Sixtieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 21, before the word "widow," to insert "former," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Lida W. Ashton, former widow of Charles L. Ashton, late of Company G, Fifty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 10, after the word "late," to strike out "of" and insert "lieutenant colonel," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Helen M. Brown, former widow of Harvey M. Brown, late lieutenant colonel Thirty-sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 13, after the name "Mills," to strike out "who served under the name of" and insert "alias," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Hiram J. Mills, alias James H. Thomas, late of Company F, Twelfth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 17, to strike out:

The name of Martha J. Curtiss, widow of Frank S. Curtiss, late of One hundred and twenty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 12, to strike out:

The name of Anna Nau, widow of Joseph Nau, late of Company E, Ninth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 14, after the word "late," to strike out "of" and insert "lieutenant colonel," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Harriet F. Kidd, widow of Meredith H. Kidd, late lieutenant colonel Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, line 13, after the word "late," to strike out "of the" and insert "quartermaster sergeant," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Thomas A. Williamson, late quartermaster sergeant One hundred and eighty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 4, before the word "Regiment," to strike out "twenty-third" and insert "twenty-first," so as to make the clause read:

The name of John H. Moore, late of Company H, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment, and Company K, Sixty-fifth Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $27 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 8, after the name "Roseberry," to insert "widow of William W. Roseberry, late of Company L, Second Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Mary E. Roseberry, widow of William W. Roseberry, late of Company L, Second Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and former widow of Richard B. Price, late of Company B, Thirty-ninth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ISRAEL FOLSOM.

The bill (S. 140) for the relief of the estate of Israel Folsom was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 1, to strike out "governor" and insert "principal chief," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized and directed to hear and adjudicate the claim of the administrator of the estate of Israel Folsom, deceased, and to render judgment thereon in such amount, if any, as may appear to be equitably due. Said judgment, if any, in favor of said administrator of Folsom shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Choctaw Indians or Nation, said judgment to be rendered on the principle of quantum meruit for services rendered and expenses incurred. Notice of said suit shall be served on the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, and the Attorney General of the United States shall appear and defend said suit on behalf of said nation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POWER SQUADRONS.

The bill (S. 1416) to amend section 4215 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that members of the United States Power Squadrons, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Massachusetts, who shall, after having passed the examination provided for by the by-laws or rules and regulations of said squadron, have received a certificate of competency to operate and navigate a power boat in accordance with the rules and regulations of said United States Power Squadrons, may, instead of the signal provided for by section 4215 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, be permitted to fly a distinguishing signal rectangular in shape, the width to be nineteen thirty-sixths of the length, consisting of a fly of 7 blue and 6 white alternate vertical strips of equal width and a red field on which shall be placed a circle of 13 white five-pointed stars surrounding a white foul anchor; the field shall occupy the upper corner, next the hoist, six-thirteenths of the length and seven-thirteenths of the hoist of the flag.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAJO RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The bill (S. 2500) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Moqui and Navajo Indian Reservations in the State of Arizona was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on a part of the Navajo Indian Reservation in the State of Arizona."

BILLS OF LADING.

The bill (S. 19) relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce, was considered as in Committee or the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce was, on page 5, line 20, after the word "section," to strike out "twenty-nine" and insert "twenty-six."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see the report on the bill states that it is the same measure with the exception of a few formal amendments that has been twice passed by the Senate, having been recommended by the department. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if he thinks it is necessary to read the entire bill again?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not. I wish to make a little explanation, however. Sections 2, 3, and 10 of the bill as it passed before were eliminated, as I think I stated before the committee. I have no desire that the time of the Senate shall be occupied by a further reading of the bill except that there are a few very minor amendments which are referred to in the original part of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I was under the impression that those verbal amendments had been agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are being agreed to in the order in which they are reached in the reading.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My suggestion was made simply to save time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, except as it may be read in connection with minor amendments. Unless there is objection, such will be the order. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 14, after the word "quantity," strike out "if" and insert "of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 19, line 3, after the word "thereof," insert "or section or part thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMERENE. Accompanying the bill is the report of the committee, and it discusses the history of this legislation and also treats of certain constitutional questions which are involved in it. I suggest that, in my judgment, it would be well to have the entire report printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The report, submitted by Mr. POMERENE on the 15th of February, 1916, is as follows:

CALENDAR No. 140.

[Senate Report No. 149, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

BILLS OF LADING.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 19).

The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred Senate bill 19, reports it back to the Senate with the recommendation that it pass with the following amendments:

On page 5, line 21, strike out "nine" and insert in lieu thereof "six."

On page 9, line 14, strike out "if" and insert therefor the word "of."

On page 19, after the word "thereof," line 3, insert "or section or part thereof."

This is, in substance, the same bill passed on August 24, 1912, and again on June 5, 1914. It is the result of the labors of the commissioners on uniform State laws of the American Bar Association, after repeated conferences with representatives of the American Bankers' Association, the railroad organizations, and the shippers associations. It was originally prepared for the purpose of having it presented to the several State legislatures with a view to providing uniform legislation upon the subject. It has already become the law in 10 of the leading commercial States—Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Maryland, Michigan, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

The pending bill does not vary substantially from the acts passed by the legislatures of the States just named, save that it is made to apply to interstate and foreign commerce.

In its present form the bill was approved by the American Bar Association at its thirty-eighth annual meeting held in Salt Lake City in August, 1915.

NECESSITY FOR FEDERAL LEGISLATION.

The total exports and imports for the year 1915 amounted to $5,329,521,248.

In the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee it was testified by well-informed witnesses that bills of lading were annually issued in American commerce representing consignments of merchandise valued at $25,000,000,000; that 99 per cent of the tonnage and value of the commodities shipped and covered by these bills of lading involved interstate and foreign commerce and only 1 per cent intrastate commerce.

On these bills of lading it is estimated that $5,000,000,000 in cash was advanced annually by the banks. It must follow, therefore, that any reasonable legislation which will lead to the security of these bills of lading in the hands of their owners or holders must be of immense value to the commerce of the country.

It affects the business of 100,000,000 of people, extending into 48 States of the Union and to all the nations of the world.

In 1889 the United States Supreme Court, in Friedlander v. Texas & Pacific Railroad (130 U. S., 416), held:

"A bill of lading fraudulently issued by the station agent of a railroad company, without receiving the goods named in it for transportation but in other respects according to the customary course of business, imposes no liability upon the company to an innocent holder who receives it without knowledge or notice of the fraud and for a valuable consideration."

Under the agreed statement of facts in the case just cited it appears that the bill of lading issued November 6, 1883, was executed by one Easton, the agent of the railroad company, fraudulently and in collusion with one Lahnestein, and without receiving any of the cotton called for by the bill of lading, and without any expectation of receiving it on the part of Easton. A conspiracy had been entered into between Easton and Lahnestein to issue these bills of lading for Lahnestein's benefit. They had been guilty of similar transactions.

The court held that under these circumstances the agent was acting beyond the scope of his authority, and therefore the railroad company was not bound.

Whether this decision was sound or not, it was based upon precedents, and ever since has been recognized as the law of the land by the Federal courts, as well as by some of the State courts. This ruling has resulted in great losses to the buyers of merchandise who have the right to depend upon the bona fides of bills of lading, to bankers and financial men who have bought or discounted drafts secured by these bills of lading, and to sellers and buyers of cotton, grain, or other merchandise, whose transactions are discredited by reason of the frauds which have been perpetrated by fraudulent shippers conspiring with freight agents. As a result millions of dollars have been lost to commerce.

The pending bill, section 22, modifies the law as laid down in the Friedlander case by declaring:

"That if a bill of lading has been issued by a carrier or on his behalf by an agent or employee the scope of whose actual or apparent authority includes the issuing of bills of lading, the carrier shall be liable to (a) the consignee named in a straight bill, or (b) the holder of an order bill, who has given value in good faith, relying upon the description therein of the goods, for damages caused by the nonreceipt by the carrier of all or part of the goods or their failure to correspond with the description thereof in the bill at the time of its issue."

The committee will not take the time to discuss all of the features of the bill, but among the most important they desire to call attention to the following:

1. Duplicate bills of lading.
2. Altered bills of lading.
3. Spent bills of lading.
4. Shipper's load and count.
5. Forgeries.

DUPLICATE BILLS OF LADING.

The proposed regulations with regard to duplicate bills of lading are found in sections 4 and 5 and 15, which read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That order bills issued in a State for the transportation of goods to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, shall not be issued in parts or sets. If so issued, the carrier issuing them shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods described therein to anyone who purchases a part for value in good faith, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to a holder of one of the other parts: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall be interpreted or construed to forbid the issuing of order bills in parts or sets for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for so doing.

"SEC. 5. That when more than one order bill is issued in a State for the same goods to be transported to any place in the United States on the Continent of North America, except Alaska and Panama, the word 'duplicate' or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill, shall be placed plainly upon the face of every such bill except the one first issued. A carrier shall be liable for the damage caused by his failure so to do to anyone who has purchased the bill for value in good faith as an original, even though the purchase be after the delivery of the goods by the carrier to the holder of the original bill: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this section shall in such case for such transportation of goods to Alaska, Panama, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, or foreign countries be interpreted or construed so as to require the placing of the word 'duplicate' thereon, or to impose the liabilities set forth in this section for failure so to do.

"SEC. 15. That a bill, upon the face of which the word 'duplicate,' or some other word or words indicating that the document is not an original bill, is placed plainly shall impose upon the carrier issuing the same the liability of one who represents and warrants that such bill is an accurate copy of an original bill properly issued, but no other liability."

ALTERED BILLS OF LADING.

Section 13 provides:

"That any alteration, addition, or erasure in a bill after its issue without authority from the carrier issuing the same, either in writing or noted on the bill, shall be void, whatever be the nature and purpose of the change, and the bill shall be enforceable according to its original tenor."

SPENT BILLS OF LADING.

Many frauds have been committed in the commercial world by using bills of lading after the goods have been delivered, and which have not been taken up or canceled. Frequently they have been used for the purpose of securing credit, although the goods called for have been delivered. The railroads have not been liable because they have been able to prove the delivery of the goods. Sections 11 and 12 of the bill remedy these abuses. They read as follows:

"SEC. 11. That except as provided in section 29, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers goods for which an order bill had been issued, the negotiations of which would transfer the right to the possession of the goods, and fails to take up and cancel the bill, such carrier shall be liable for failure to deliver the goods to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases such bill, whether such purchaser acquired title to the bill before or after the delivery of the goods by the carrier and notwithstanding delivery was made to the person entitled thereto.

"SEC. 12. That except as provided in section 26, and except when compelled by legal process, if a carrier delivers part of the goods for which an order bill had been issued and fails either—

"(a) To take up and cancel the bill, or

"(b) To place plainly upon it a statement that a portion of the goods has been delivered with a description which may be in general terms either of the goods or packages that have been so delivered or of the goods or packages which still remain in the carrier's possession—he shall be liable for failure to deliver all the goods specified in the bill to anyone who for value and in good faith purchases it, whether such purchaser acquired title to it before or after the delivery of any portion of the goods by the carrier, and notwithstanding such delivery was made to the person entitled thereto."

SHIPPER'S LOAD AND COUNT.

Many abuses have arisen by carriers marking bills of lading "Shipper's load and count." This of course affects their value for banking and credit purposes. These abuses are sought to be remedied by sections 20 and 21 of the bill, which provide:

"SEC. 20. That when goods are loaded by a carrier such carrier shall count the packages of goods if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity if bulk freight, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading or in any notice, receipt, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff, 'Shipper's weight, load, and count,' or other words of like purport, indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein.

"SEC. 21. That when goods are loaded by a shipper at a place where the carrier maintains an agency, such carrier shall, on written request of such shipper, and when given a reasonable opportunity by the shipper so to do, count the packages of goods if package freight, and ascertain the kind and quantity if bulk freight, within a reasonable time after such written request, and such carrier shall not, in such cases, insert in the bill of lading, or in any notice, receipt, contract, rule, regulation, or tariff, 'Shipper's weight, load, and count,' or other words of like purport indicating that the goods were loaded by the shipper and the description of them made by him. If so inserted, contrary to the provisions of this section, said words shall be treated as null and void and as if not inserted therein."

FORGED BILLS OF LADING.

While the laws of the several States penalize the forging of bills of lading, it is believed, because of the fact that approximately 99 per cent of our commerce is interstate or foreign in character, there should be some Federal legislation making the forging and issuing of forged bills of lading punishable by Federal courts. This is done by section 41 of the pending bill, which is as follows:

"That any person who, knowingly or with intent to defraud, falsely makes, alters, forges, counterfeits, prints or photographs any bill of lading, or with like intent utters or publishes as true and genuine any such falsely altered, forged, counterfeited, falsely printed or photographed bill of lading, knowing it to be falsely altered, forged, counterfeited, falsely printed or photographed, or aids in making, altering, forging, counterfeiting, printing or photographing, or uttering or publishing the same, or issues or aids in issuing or procuring the issue of, or negotiates or transfers for value a bill which contains a false statement as to the receipt of the goods, or as to any other matter, or who, with intent to defraud, violates, or fails to comply with, or aids in any violation of, or failure to comply with any provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished for each offense by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both."

It is not intended by this report to call special attention to all the provisions of the bill. They are self-explanatory. Suffice is to say that in addition to the correction of the abuses hereinbefore specially referred to, the bill is a codification of the law and principles now controlling, and which ought to control, interstate and foreign shipments. It defines the right and liabilities of the common carriers, consignors, consignees, and all other immediate owners or holders of bills of lading. If adopted, it will serve to make more uniform the commercial law of our country.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE PENDING BILL.

Some doubt has been expressed as to the constitutionality of those provisions of the bill relating to the transfer or negotiation of bills of lading. A brief discussion of this question is therefore opportune:

The Constitution vests Congress with power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." This authority is very broad, very comprehensive. It covers all phases and features of interstate commerce. It touches not only the property of the railroad, but all of its instrumentalities. It controls and protects its operation and its business. The shipment of goods from one State to another is surely interstate commerce. If so, when it comes to the physical property itself, can there be any doubt that the same power extends to all of the instrumentalities used in the conveyance of the property or to any contract which may pertain to it for the safeguarding of the parties interested? If the goods which are shipped from one State to another be interstate commerce, are we going far afield when we say that the bill of lading, which is the symbolic representative of the goods, is also interstate commerce?

The committee will not take the time to discuss all of the decisions of our Supreme Court bearing upon this subject. We shall only refer to a few of them:

In 1911 the Supreme Court had before it the case of the Southern Railway Co. v. The United States. The statute involved was what is commonly known as the "safety appliance act" of March 2, 1893, as amended March 2, 1903. Its regulatory features applied to all locomotives, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railway that is a highway of interstate commerce, and were not confined exclusively to vehicles engaged in such commerce.

In the syllabus of the case, 222 U. S., 20, the court says:

"The power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution is plenary and competent to protect persons and property moving in interstate commerce from all danger, no matter what the source may be; to that end Congress may require all vehicles moving on highways of interstate commerce to be so equipped as to avoid danger to persons and property moving in interstate commerce.

"It is of common knowledge that interstate and intrastate commerce are commingled in transportation over highways of interstate commerce; that trains and cars on the same railroad, whether engaged in one form of traffic or the other, are interdependent, and that absence of safety appliances from any part of a train is a menace not only to that train, but to others."

Mr. Justice Van De Vanter, in delivering the opinion of the court, on page 26, says:

"We come, then, to the question whether these acts are within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, considering that they are not confined to vehicles used in moving interstate traffic, but embrace vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic. The answer to this question depends upon another, which is, Is there a real or substantial relation or connection between what is required by these acts in respect of vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic and the object which the acts obviously are designed to attain, namely, the safety of interstate commerce and of those who are employed in its movement? Or, stating it in another way: Is there such a close or direct relation or connection between the two classes of traffic, when moving over the same railroad, as to make it certain that the safety of the interstate traffic and of those who are employed in its movement will be promoted in a real or substantial sense by applying the requirements of these acts to vehicles used in moving the traffic which is intrastate as well as to those in moving that which is interstate? If the answer to this question, as doubly stated, be in the affirmative, then the principal question must be answered in the same way. And this is so not because Congress possesses any power to regulate intrastate commerce as such, but because its power to regulate interstate commerce is plenary and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of the persons and property transported therein and of those who are employed in such transportation, no matter what may be the source of the dangers which threaten it. That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise, in whole or in part, out of matters connected with intrastate commerce."

In the same report, on page 370, Mr. Chief Justice White handed down the opinion of the Supreme Court in Northern Pacific Ry. v. State of Washington. The case involved the validity of the act of Congress known as the "hours-of-service law," passed March 4, 1907.

In the syllabus the court says:

"A train moving and carrying freight between two points in the same State, but which is hauling freight between points one of which is within and the other without the State, or hauling it through the State between points both without the State, is engaged in interstate commerce and subject to the laws of Congress enacted in regard thereto."

On page 377 the court quotes approvingly the language of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington, as follows:

"The power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is plenary, and that, as an incident to this power, the Congress may regulate by legislation the instrumentalities engaged in the business, and may prescribe the number of consecutive hours an employee of a carrier so engaged shall be required to remain on duty; and that when it does legislate upon the subject, its act supersedes any and all State legislation on that particular subject."

The court cites in support of this doctrine a number of its former decisions. In fact, this proposition is not regarded by the courts as debatable.

In Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Behrens, administrator (233 U. S., 473), the court said:

"When a railroad is a highway of both interstate and intrastate commerce, and the two classes of traffic are interdependent in point of both movement and safety, Congress may, under the power committed to it by the commerce clause of the Constitution, regulate the liability of the carrier for injuries suffered by an employee engaged in general work pertaining to both classes of commerce, whether the particular service performed at the time, isolatedly considered, is in interstate or intrastate commerce."

In St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. v. Edwards (227 U. S., 265) the Supreme Court held that—

"As applied to interstate shipments, the State can not impose penalties for delay in delivery to consignee, as Congress has acted on that subject by the passage of the Hepburn Act."

In Adams Express Co. v. Croninger (226 U. S., 491) Mr. Justice Lurton, at page 500, says:

"That the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations comprehends power to regulate contracts between the shipper and the carrier of an interstate shipment by defining the liability of the carrier for loss, delay, injury, or damage to such property needs neither argument nor citation of authority.

"That the legislation (of Congress) supersedes all the regulations and policies of a particular State upon the same subject results from its general character. It embraces the subject of the liability of the carrier under a bill of lading which he must issue and limits his power to exempt himself by rule, regulation, or contract. Almost every detail of the subject is covered so completely that there can be no rational doubt but that Congress intended to take possession of the subject and supersede all State regulation with reference to it. Only the silence of Congress authorized the exercise of the police power of the State upon the subject of such contracts. But when Congress acted in such a way as to manifest a purpose to exercise its conceded authority, the regulating power of the State ceased to exist."

In Houston & Texas Railway v. United States (234 U. S., 343) the language of the syllabus, in part, is:

"The object of the commerce clause was to prevent interstate trade from being destroyed or impeded by the rivalries of local governments; and it is the essence of the complete and paramount power confided to Congress to regulate interstate commerce that wherever it exists it dominates.

"Wherever the interstate and intrastate transactions of carriers are so related that the government of one involves the control of the other, it is Congress and not the State that is entitled to prescribe the final and dominant rule, otherwise the Nation would not be supreme within the national field.

"While Congress does not possess authority to regulate the internal commerce of a State, as such, it does possess power to foster and protect interstate commerce, although in taking necessary measures so to do it may be necessary to control intrastate transactions of interstate carriers.

"The use of the State of an instrument of interstate commerce in a discriminatory manner so as to inflict injury on any part of that commerce is a ground for Federal intervention; nor can a State authorize a carrier to do that which Congress may forbid and has forbidden."

Again, in Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway v. Hardwick Elevator Co. (226 U. S., 427), it was held that—

"There can be no divided authority over interstate commerce, and regulations of Congress on that subject are supreme.

"As to those subjects upon which the States may act in the absence of legislation by Congress, the power of the State ceases the moment Congress exerts its paramount authority thereover."

Now, let us apply the doctrine of these cases to the bill under consideration. They show conclusively that if Congress passes this bill it will supersede any and all State legislation upon the subject.

It is urged by those who oppose this bill that if goods be sent from New York to Cleveland and the bill of lading is indorsed and transferred by one citizen of Cleveland to another citizen of Cleveland, within the State of Ohio, it is an intrastate transaction and can not be controlled by Congress. As applied to an ordinary contract, if there were no other facts involved, this position would be correct. But we answer, the lines of shipment are interstate lines; the trains carrying the goods from one State to another are "instrumentalities" employed in interstate commerce, the shipment of the goods from one State to another is interstate commerce, and in order to define the rights and liabilities of the carrier, the consignor, consignee, and immediate owners, both law and public policy require that the company shall issue bills of lading.

Can it be said that the bill of lading, which is the representative of this interstate business, defining the rights and liabilities of all concerned, is not a contract relating to interstate commerce, and therefore not controlled by its principles?

Those who object to the bill admit that interstate shipments are subject to Federal control, save only where it relates to a transfer of the bill of lading within a State between citizens of that State. If Congress assumes control of this legislation affecting interstate commerce, must it continue to divide its authority with the State when it comes to the mere negotiation and transfer of the bill of lading between two citizens of the same State within the State, but under all other circumstances the State shall have no control? If such be the case, what becomes of the doctrine that the power of Congress is plenary after it has once assumed to legislate upon a given subject? If so, would the Federal law supersede State legislation?

If Congress has the power to compel safety appliances to be placed on cars used both in interstate and intrastate transportation over interstate highways in order to insure the safety of interstate traffic, as was held in Southern Railway v. United States, above cited; if it has power to prescribe the number of consecutive hours of service of a crew moving a train from one point to another in the State of Washington hauling merchandise from points within the State to points without the State, as well as in carrying merchandise through the State from a point without the State to a foreign destination, in view of the unity and indivisibility of the service of the train crew and the paramount character of the authority of Congress to regulate commerce, as was held in Northern Pacific Railway v. State of Washington, above cited; if Congress has the power to regulate the carrier's liability for injuries to an employee occurring upon a highway of both interstate and intrastate commerce where the two kinds of traffic are interdependent in point of movement and safety and where the injuries were suffered while the employee was engaged in general work pertaining to both classes of commerce, whether the particular service performed at the time isolatedly considered is interstate or intrastate commerce, as was held in Illinois Central Railroad Co. v. Behrens, administrator, above cited; if the State can not impose penalties for delay and delivery to a consignee because Congress has acted upon that subject by the passage of the Hepburn Act, as was held in St. Louis, etc., Railway v. Edwards, above cited; and if when Congress acts in such a way as to manifest its purpose to exercise its conceded authority, the regulatory power of the State ceases to exist, as was held in Adams Express Co. v. Croninger, above cited, are we going far afield when we conclude that if Congress decides to regulate a bill of lading from the time it is issued until it is spent it supersedes the authority of the State to control such bill in its transfer from one citizen of a State to another citizen within that State?

Paraphrasing the language of Mr. Justice Van Devanter, may not this power of Federal control be exerted to secure the safety of the property transported therein, no matter what may be the source of the danger which threatens, whether it be by transfer or negotiation between two parties residing in different States or in the same State? Can we not say, again borrowing the thought of the learned justice, that it is no objection that the dangers intended to be avoided arise in whole or in part out of matters connected with intrastate commerce?

Would it not be hypercritical to say that the bill of lading thus relating to interstate shipments is valid and binding on all parties concerned from the day it is issued to the day it is spent, and subject to the control of Congress at all times save only when it is transferred or negotiated by or between two citizens of a State within the same State? Is it sound to say the Federal law can regulate its issuance and operation before it is thus transferred or negotiated between two citizens of the same State, and resume its jurisdiction immediately after it is thus transferred or negotiated between them, provided the subsequent transfers or negotiations shall be between citizens of different States? Must Congress, after it has assumed jurisdiction, surrender it for a moment of time to the State authorities only to resume it again after a certain contingency? If so, what becomes of the doctrine of our Supreme Court that when Congress does legislate upon a subject its act supersedes any and all State legislation on that particular subject?

A careful study of these decisions of our Supreme Court force the conclusion that the constitutional objections raised are not sound.

DENATURED ALCOHOL.

The bill (S. 3861) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the withdrawal from bond tax free of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses when mixed with suitable denaturing materials,'" approved March 2, 1907, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, on page 2, line 7, before the word "accident," to strike out the word "unavoidable," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act for the withdrawal from bond tax free of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses when mixed with suitable denaturing materials,'" approved March 2, 1907, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to section 3 thereof the following:

"Provided, That where alcohol is withdrawn from a distillery warehouse for shipment to a central denaturing bonded warehouse under the provisions of this act it shall be lawful under such rules, regulations, and limitations as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for an allowance to be made for leakage or loss by any accident, and without any fraud or negligence of the distiller, owner, carrier, or their agents or employees, occurring during transportation from a distillery warehouse to a centarl denaturing bonded warehouse."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object to the bill.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I hope the Senator will not object. I think if he will look into the matter he will find——

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to look into the bill. I do not exactly understand it.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I can state the object of the bill to the Senator in just a minute if he will permit me.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is this the bill which provides for the leakage of alcohol and the repayment of certain taxes?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. I thought it was similar to a bill——

Mr. BROUSSARD. It provides that in transporting alcohol from the distillery to the denaturization plant in transit the tax upon the alcohol, when denaturized, should not be collected.

Mr. OVERMAN. It refers only to denatured alcohol?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It refers only to denatured alcohol.

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw the objection. I thought it was another bill.

The bill was passed.

ARMY AVIATION SERVICE.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 65) creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 5, before the word "members," to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to read "to consist of two members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs," etc.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in connection with this amendment I wish to state to the Senate that I do not believe the amendment should be agreed to. I think the Senate should have an equal representation with the House of Representatives on the commission. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs authorized me to state that that is his conclusion, and that the members of the committee, so far as he has been able to consult them, agree in that view. Therefore I ask that the amendment be not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee reducing the representation in the Senate from three to two.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "stenographers," to insert "to report hearings which may be held by such commission."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 14, page 2, after the word "papers," to insert "to administer oaths."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of the bill:

That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said commission, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask a question about the joint resolution before it is passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I notice the bill provides, on page 2, that the commission must report before May 1. I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he thinks that will give them time enough.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there should be an amendment extending the time. The joint resolution was introduced some months ago. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of an amendment making it July 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion ordering the joint resolution to a third reading will be reconsidered, unless there is objection. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to amendment. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 18, strike out "May" and insert "July."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The joint resolution as amended and passed reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service, Signal Corps, of the United States Army, be, and the same is hereby, created to consist of three members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and three members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

That said commission shall investigate the organization, conduct, and efficiency of the Aviation Service, Signal Corps, of the United States Army.

Said commission, as soon as practicable after it has been appointed, shall organize by the election of a chairman and secretary, and shall have power to employ stenographers to report hearings which may be held by such commission at not exceeding $1 per printed page, and such other officers, assistants, and employees as the commission may deem necessary.

Said commission is authorized to sit during the sessions and during the recess of Congress, to issue process, and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, to administer oaths, and to perform any other act or thing necessary to the efficient discharge of its duty.

That said commission shall report its findings and recommendations to the Congress on or before July 1, 1916.

That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to be paid out on the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said commission, which audit and order shall be conclusive and binding upon all departments as to the correctness of the accounts of such commission.

HAWAIIAN HARBOR COMMISSIONERS.

The bill (H. R. 3042) to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with an amendment, on page 6, line 18, after the word "oils," to strike out the word "unto" and insert "into."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

HAWAIIAN FRANCHISES.

The bill (H. R. 65) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric light and power, telephone, railroad, and street railway companies and franchises in the Territory of Hawaii, and amending the laws relating thereto was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SHAFROTH subsequently said: There was objection made to House bill 65, to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric light and power, and so forth. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has had the bill explained to him. He is the Senator who made the objection, and he is willing that the bill should now be taken up.

Mr. GRONNA. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill be taken up at this time?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 4, line 1, before "powers" to strike out "of" and insert "or"; and in line 3 to strike out after "commerce" the words "within the States and the Territories of the United States."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

HAWAIIAN ISLAND ELECTRIC CO.

The bill (H. R. 6241) to ratify, approve, and confirm an act amending the franchise granted to H. P. Baldwin, R. A. Wadsworth, J. N. S. Williams, D. C. Lindsay, C. D. Lufkin, James L. Coke, and W. T. Robinson, and now held under assignment to Island Electric Co. (Ltd.), by extending it to include the Makawao district on the island of Maui, Territory of Hawaii, and extending the control of the Public Utilities Commission of the Territory of Hawaii to said franchise and its holder, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

MATHILDA P. HANSEN.

The bill (S. 67) for the relief of Mathilda P. Hansen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims, with an amendment, in line 7, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Mathilda P. Hansen, of Salt Lake City, Utah, widow of Christian Hansen, the sum of $500, for improvements made by Christian Hansen on lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, section 12, township 21 north, range 11 east, Willamette meridian, North Yakima, Wash., land district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE HAZELBAKER.

The bill (S. 927) for the relief of Clarence Hazelbaker was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill:

Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall only be paid out in sums from time to time upon the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Me-yone-yah, a Nez Perce Indian, or the legal representative of said Indian, the sum of $2,400, upon the execution by said Indian, or his legal representative, of a proper quitclaim deed in relinquishment of all right and title of said Indian in and to the west half of the northeast quarter of section 15, township 31 north, range 3 east, Boise meridian, under allotment No. 1287, so that there shall be no conflict by reason of such allotment with the claim of one Clarence Hazelbaker to such land by virtue of homestead patent No. 152479, issued to the said Hazelbaker by the General Land Office of the United States September 15, 1910: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall only be paid out in sums from time to time upon the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES IN INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The bill (S. 40) to authorize agricultural entries on surplus coal lands in Indian reservations was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMER D. LEWIS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to recur to the bill (S. 137) for the relief of Omer D. Lewis. I objected to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration the bill he has indicated. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill has been read. It will be recalled that an amendment was adopted at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I now move, in line 8, before the word "for," to insert the word "and," so as to read "medical attendance and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS AT MYTON, UTAH.

The bill (S. 35) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Myton, Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH HATCHERY IN UTAH.

The bill (S. 34) granting to the State of Utah title to certain lands in said State for use as a fish hatchery was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes over.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 11078) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 3, line 4, before the words "per month," to strike out "$24" and insert "$20," so as to make the clause read:

The name of Nannie J. McDowell, widow of James H. McDowell, late of Company B, Seventeenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 6, after the name "Hammond," to insert the word "late," so as to make the clause read:

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the remainder of the bills on the calendar to which there is no objection, under Rule VIII, down to and including calendar No. 205.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the request?

Mr. SMOOT. I am simply asking unanimous consent that we proceed with the calendar, under Rule VIII, until we reach calendar No. 205—the last bill on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VARDAMAN. How long will it take to do that?

Mr. SMOOT. It will not take very long.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will not object to that request, provided it does not take longer than an hour.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well. I will modify my request and ask that it extend until 5 o'clock.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And to include unobjected matters only.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request preferred by the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATUE OF JAMES BUCHANAN.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a statue of James Buchanan, a former President of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution, being objected to, goes over.

LAND GRANT TO LEMMON, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 3203) granting to the city of Lemmon, S. Dak., certain lands for reservoir purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, before the word "quarter," to strike out "northwest" and insert "northeast," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue a patent to the authorities of the city of Lemmon, in the State of South Dakota, for reservoir purposes, in connection with the water supply of said city, for the following described lands situate in the county of Adams and the State of North Dakota, to wit: The east half of the northeast quarter of section 10 and the west half of the northwest quarter of section 11, in township 129 north of range 92 west of the fifth principal meridian, in the Dickinson, N. Dak., land district, containing 160 acres, said patent to contain a provision that said land shall be used for reservoir purposes and in connection with the water supply for said city and for a public pleasure resort; and in case said land shall cease to be used for such purposes it shall at once revert to the United States: Provided, That said city shall pay $1.25 per acre therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLARGED HOMESTEADS.

The bill (S. 3263) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead" was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported to the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 20, after the word "entry," to strike out the word "to" and to insert "shall be in reasonably compact form and," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), as said act is amended by the acts of June 13, 1912 (37 Stat., 132), February 11, 1913 (37 Stat., 666), March 3, 1915 (38 Stat., 953, 956), and March 4, 1915 (38 Stat., 1162), be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That any person who has made, or shall make, homestead entry of lands of the character herein described, and who has not submitted final proof thereon, or who having submitted final proof still owns and occupies the land thus entered, shall have the right to enter public lands, subject to the provisions of this act, contiguous to his first entry, which shall not, together with the original entry, exceed 320 acres: Provided, That any person who has prior to the passage of this act made a homestead entry of lands of the character herein described and is unable, because there is no vacant land of like character contiguous to his original entry, to enter additional land, may be permitted to make an additional entry of noncontiguous land of the character described in this act, which shall not, together with the original entry, exceed 320 acres; such additional entry shall be in reasonably compact form and be subject to all the provisions of this act relating to improvement, cultivation, and final proof: Provided, That the land originally entered and that covered by the additional entry shall have first been designated as subject to this act, as provided by section 1 thereof."

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that that bill go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota objects, and the bill goes over.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND TO BOZEMAN, MONT.

The bill (S. 1067) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to convey, by quitclaim deed, to the city of Bozeman, Mont., for the purpose of a public alley, and for no other purpose, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a strip of land 10 feet in width off of the rear of the Federal building site in that city provided the adjacent and abutting property owners shall also quitclaim to the city a strip of land of sufficient width to create a 17½-foot alley; and the city of Bozeman shall open the alley and improve and maintain it as other public alleys of the city are improved and maintained.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NONMINERAL ENTRY OF WITHDRAWN LANDS.

The bill (S. 1064) to provide for the nonmineral entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals in Alaska, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to be heard for just a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana, in a few words, that I myself do not object to the bill, but there is a Senator who wishes to offer amendments to it and to speak upon the bill. I am, therefore, following out the request which he has made of me.

Mr. MYERS. I merely wish to say——

Mr. SMOOT. I voted to report the bill to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I know the Senator did so in committee, and, if he is still in favor of it, I hope he will be willing to withdraw his objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think this is rather an astonishing request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. We have just passed calendar No. 148, a bill which was introduced by the Senator from Utah, applicable to the coal lands in Indian reservations, which is identical in its terms with the bill to the consideration of which the Senator from Utah has entered his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill to which the Senator refers related to Indian lands. I stated to the Senator's colleague that I had no objection to the passage of the bill, that I voted to report it favorably to the Senate, and that I will vote for the bill when it is acted upon by the Senate. I have no amendment to offer to it, but a Senator called my attention to the fact that he desired to offer an amendment to the bill, and that Senator is not in the Chamber at this time. If the Senator from Montana, under those conditions, asks me to withdraw my objection, I will do so.

Mr. WALSH. The Senate has to-day, without objection, passed more bills which have been introduced by the Senator from Utah than were introduced by any other Senator on the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator, under the situation I have stated, want me to withdraw my objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. I do not want the Senator to act according to my suggestions at all. He can take his own course about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, and I shall now, in order to show the Senator from Montana that I have no personal interest in the matter, ask that the bill be considered, and I shall not object to it. If, however, the Senator to whom I have referred wishes on to-morrow to move for a reconsideration of the bill, I shall hope the Senate will give him that privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand what the Senator from Utah means. Does the Senator object to the present consideration of the bill which has been called on the calendar?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not object to its consideration, with the explanation I have made.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That lands withdrawn or classified as coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals or which are valuable for those deposits, shall be subject to appropriation, location, selection, entry, or purchase, if otherwise available, under the nonmineral land laws of the United States applicable to Alaska whenever such location, selection, entry, or purchase shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the deposits on account of which the lands were withdrawn or classified or reported as valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: Provided, That all applications to locate, select, enter, or purchase under this section shall state that the same are made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

SEC. 2. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the location, selection, entry, or purchase is made, the locator, slector, entryman, or purchaser shall be entitled to a patent to the land located, selected, entered, or purchased, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of the deposits on account of which the lands so patented were withdrawn or classified or reported as valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, such deposits to be subject to disposal by the United States only as shall be hereafter expressly directed by law. Any person qualified to acquire the reserved deposits may enter upon said lands with a view of prospecting for the same upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting, the measure of any such damage to be fixed by agreement of parties or by a court of competent jurisdiction. Any person who has acquired from the United States the title to or the right to mine and remove the reserved deposits, should the United States dispose of the mineral deposits in lands, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the minerals therefrom, and mine and remove such minerals, upon payment of damages caused thereby to the owner of the land, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking therefor in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be held to deny or abridge the right to present and have prompt consideration of applications to locate, select, enter, or purchase, under the land laws of the United States applicable to Alaska, lands which have been withdrawn or classified as coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic mineral lands, with a view of disproving such classification and securing patent without reservation, nor shall persons who have located, selected, entered, or purchased lands subsequently withdrawn, or classified as valuable for said mineral deposits, be debarred from the privilege of showing, at any time before final entry, purchase, or approval of selection or location, that the lands entered, selected, or located are in fact nonmineral in character.

SEC. 3. That any person who has, in good faith, located, selected, entered, or purchased, or any person who shall hereafter locate, select, enter, or purchase, under the nonmineral land laws of the United States applicable to Alaska any lands which are subsequently withdrawn, classified, or reported as being valuable for coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals, may, upon application therefor, and making satisfactory proof of compliance with the laws under which such lands are claimed, receive a patent therefor, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all deposits on account of which the lands were withdrawn, classified, or reported as being valuable, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES.

The bill (S. 1068) relating to desert-land entries was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "acquired," to insert "as an enlarged homestead entry and," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right to made a desert-land entry shall not be denied to any applicant therefor who has already made an enlarged homestead entry of 320 acres: Provided, That said applicant is a duly qualified entryman and the whole area to be acquired as an enlarged homestead entry and under the provisions of this act does not exceed 480 acres.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA NATIONAL FOREST.

The bill (S. 3764) to consolidate certain forest lands in the Florida National Forest was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It empowers the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of consolidating the forest lands belonging to the United States within the Florida National Forest, upon the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture, to exchange lands belonging to the United States which are part of the Florida National Forest for privately owned lands of approximately equal value, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, within the exterior limits of the national forest, which lands upon the consummation of the exchange shall become a part of the Florida National Forest.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND GRANT TO ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 3685) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the insane hospital for the colored, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant to the State of Alabama for the use of the Alabama Insane Hospital for the Colored all of fractional section 1, township 1 N., R. 1 W., south of Cedar Creek and west of John Chastang's private-land claim, containing 132.91 acres, and directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the State for the same; but the State shall not have the right to sell or convey the lands herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote them to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described, and in the event of attempted alienation or failure to use the lands for the purposes described they shall revert to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND CONVEYANCES BY PONCA CITY, OKLA.

The bill (S. 1086) authorizing Ponca City, Okla., and the board of education of said city to convey certain lands, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the name "Hartman," to strike out "and the west half of block 28," and to insert "and all of block A"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Ponca City and the board of education of the city of Ponca City, in the State of Oklahoma, be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell and convey, for the benefit of the school district of said city, the west half of block 35, in the town site of Bluffdale; the west half of block 13, in the town site of Hartman; and all of block A, in the town site of Lynchville, according to the approved plats of said town sites, respectively; said tracts lying and being in the corporate limits of the city of Ponca City, Okla., and containing 3.168 acres, and heretofore patented to said city for school purposes under section 22 of the act of May 2, 1890 (26 Stat., p. 81).

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS UNDER NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The bill (S. 4268) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the following sums to pay the claims arising under the Navy Department hereinafter stated, being in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final release and discharge of the respective claims, namely:

First. To reimburse James H. Boone, Frank J. Browning, Ernest Fischer, jr., John McCabe, James Plant, Millard C. Ray, and Charles H. Storer, then enlisted men of the Navy, for personal effects lost at the time of the boiler explosion on the U. S. S. Aylwin on April 6, 1914, $45.39.

Second. To reimburse the Seaboard Air Line Railway for the cost of repairs to Virginia & Southwestern steel gondola car No. 10,569 for the cost of repairs to this car damaged at the navy yard, Norfolk, Va., on June 17, 1914, $46.62.

The bill (S. 3900) to authorize the sale and disposal of an island in the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments on page 2, line 5, after the word "navigation," to insert "or of water power"; and in line 8, after the word "improvement," to insert "or of the development of water power," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That, with the assent of the Secretary of War, that a certain island in Coosa River, St. Clair County, Ala., known as Rock Island and described upon the official plat of survey as lot 1, section 24, township 14 south, range 5 east, and lot 1, section 19, township 14 south, range 6 east, Huntsville meridian, containing 2.55 acres, may be restored to entry, and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey said land to the Rock Island Fishing and Hunting Club, at $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the aforesaid land shall forever be and remain subject to the right of the United States to overflow same or any part thereof in the improvement and development of navigation or of water power on the Coosa River; and no claim or right to compensation shall accrue from the overflowing of said land on account of said work of improvement or of the development of water power: Provided further, That in any patent that the Secretary of the Interior may issue for said land the right to overflow without liability for damage shall be expressly reserved to the United States: Provided further, That if said Rock Island Fishing and Hunting Club should at any time use or attempt to use said tract of land for any other purpose than that of recreation or club purposes, or should attempt to sell, lease, or convey said tract of land shall revert to the United States.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CROW INDIAN LANDS IN MONTANA.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) to permit offerings at public sale of certain lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "purposes," to strike out "or in the act of April 27, 1904, entitled 'An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation in Montana, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect,'" so as to read:

That nothing contained in section 31 of the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," shall hereafter be so construed as to prohibit the offering at public sale of any tract of land affected thereby which is otherwise subject to such offering, under the provisions of section 2455, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 28, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 77): Provided, That in no order for an offering of such lands shall a minimum price be fixed less than the price therefor fixed by existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 11, to insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 2. That all lands not otherwise reserved that have been withdrawn or classified as coal lands, or are valuable for coal, restored to entry under the authority of the act approved April 27, 1904 (33 Stats., p. 352), entitled "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation in Montana, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect," shall be subject to disposal in the same manner and under such terms and conditions as have been or may be provided for the disposition of nonmineral lands opened to entry or sale by the aforesaid act: Provided, That such disposals and the lands affected thereby shall be subject to all the provisions of the act approved June 22, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 583), entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," hereby extended thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to permit of the disposition of certain lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians."

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell the coal deposits in and under certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KENYON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

MOUNT RAINIER NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 3928) to accept the cession by the State of Washington of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Mount Rainier National Park, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to say that that is rather a long bill, but it has passed the Senate twice and is identical with the law which is now on the statute books with reference to the control in the Glacier National Park. If it is possible to have it passed without a full reading, I ask that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not the bill conforms to an amendment which was made to the Glacier Park act, so as to give the commissioner to be appointed control over petty offenses?

Mr. JONES. I understand it does. It is recommended by the department and, in fact, was suggested by them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the formal reading of the bill is dispensed with. The bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

H. L. CORBIN.

The bill (S. 17) permitting H. L. Corbin to purchase certain public lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It grants permission to H. L. Corbin to purchase the west half of the southwest quarter of section 35, township 8 south, range 70 west of the sixth principal meridian, containing 80 acres, at $1.25 per acre.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, real the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN UNCOMPAHGRE INDIAN RESERVATION, UTAH.

The bill (S. 43) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the lands and also all the mineral therein within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, which was specifically reserved for future action of Congress in the act approved March 3, 1903 (32 Stats., 998), and the remainder of the lands within even-numbered section in that reservation reserved in the act approved June 7, 1897 (30 Stats., 87), as containing gilsonite, asphaltum, elaterite, or other like substances, and which were by the act of March 3, 1903, authorized to be sold and disposed of in tracts not exceeding 40 acres, shall, unless otherwise reserved, be immediately open to settlement, location, occupation, and entry under all the land laws of the United States according to the character of the lands or of the mineral deposits therein.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOORE, WOODSON, AND WHITFIELD.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to cause the settlement of the accounts of Special Agents Moore, Woodson, and Whitfield, under the treaty of 1854 with the Delaware Indians, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment, on page 2, line 16, to strike out "second auditor and second comptroller" and insert "Auditor for the Interior Department," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required to direct the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to make an administrative examination of the accounts of Ely Moore, deceased, as special register and superintendent, and Daniel Woodson, as special receiver and superintendent, and John W. Whitfield, special register and superintendent of the sales of the Indian trust lands, under the Delaware treaty of May 6, 1854; the Iowa treaty of May 17, 1854, and Wea, etc., treaty of May 30, 1854, under said treaties, as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States in case No. 216, on March 3, 1884, as shown in the opinion of said court, recorded in 110 United States Reports, page 688, who shall allow said special agents the same additional commissions allowed by said court in said case of one of the four special agents employed to carry said treaties into effect; and there shall also be allowed them any other expenses incurred in the sales of said trust lands not heretofore allowed them, together with the interest that has accrued on the moneys withheld from them, which were loaned out by acts of Congress, and who shall send their accounts to the Auditor for the Interior Department for final settlement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN NORTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 592) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "sixth" and insert "fifth," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon receipt of a proper deed from the State of North Dakota, executed under authority of the act of its legislative assembly, approved February 5, 1915, reconveying to the United States title to section 16, township 138 north, range 81 west, fifth principal meridian, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patents to said State for such vacant, surveyed, unreserved, unoccupied, nonmineral public lands as may be selected by said State within its boundaries, not exceeding 1,280 acres in aggregate area, and said section, when so reconveyed, shall not be subject to settlement, location, entry, or selection under the public-land laws, but shall be reserved for the use of the Department of Agriculture in carrying on experiments in dry-land agriculture at the Northern Great Plains Field Station, Mandan, N. Dak.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF ROADS.

The bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as a friend of that measure I ask that it go over. It will be utterly impossible for us to dispose of it under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, OKLAHOMA.

The bill (S. 4490) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Oklahoma, at a suitable place to be selected by him, and for that purpose $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated for the purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, provided that before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this bill the State of Oklahoma, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith, in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding, provided, further, that the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 3129) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Washington was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Washington on the Quinlault River or its tributaries or on Lake Quinlault, and for said purpose the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this act, the State of Washington, through appropriate legislative action shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH HATCHERY, ALABAMA.

The bill (S. 4067) to establish a fish hatchery in the State of Alabama was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a fish hatchery in the State of Alabama, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish hatchery in accordance with this bill the State of Alabama, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fish laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH HATCHERY, FLORIDA.

The bill (S. 2993) to establish a fish hatchery in the State of Florida was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a fish hatchery in the State of Florida, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish hatchery in accordance with this bill the State of Florida, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, ARIZONA.

The bill (S. 4449) to establish a fish-cultural station at some point in the State of Arizona was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a fish-cultural station at some point in the State of Arizona, including the purchase of site, construction of building, and equipment, to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance of this act, the State of Arizona, through legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, TEXAS.

The bill (S. 3261) to establish an additional fish-cultural station in the State of Texas was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of an additional fish-cultural station in the State of Texas, including the purchase of site, construction of building, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this act the State of Texas, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, NEW MEXICO.

The bill (S. 1859) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of New Mexico was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries, with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "$25,000" and to insert "$50,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of New Mexico, including purchase of site, construction of building and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this act, the State of New Mexico, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations therewith connected in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUGET SOUND NAVY YARD.

The bill (S. 4505) appropriating money to equip Puget Sound Navy Yard for battleship construction was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The bill will be passed over.

CREDIT ORGANIZATION IN NORTHERN FRANCE (S. DOC. NO. 352).

The resolution (S. Res. 115) to print the manuscript entitled "Report on Credit Organization for the Farmer and Tradesman in Northern France" as a Senate document was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on February 25, 1916, entitled "Report on Credit Organization for the Farmer and Tradesman in Northern France," by John Ball Osborne, United States consul at at Havre, France, be printed as a Senate document.

RURAL CREDITS AND LAND REGISTRATION (S. DOC. NO. 351).

The resolution (S. Res. 117) to print the manuscript entitled "Uniform State Laws Relating to Rural Credits and Land Registration" as a Senate document was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] on February 25, 1916, entitled "Uniform State Laws Relating to Rural Credits and Land Registration," being a statement submitted by S. R. Child, chairman Committee on Adoption of Approved Acts of National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, be printed as a Senate document.

STATUTE IN CONTRAVENTION OF THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW.

The resolution (S. Res. 116) to print the pamphlet entitled "The Duty of Courts to Refuse to Execute Statutes in Contravention of the Fundamental Law" as a Senate document was announced as next in order.

Mr. OWEN. I ask that that resolution be placed under Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection carries it over.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to have it transferred to Rule IX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order, unless there is objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Oklahoma to request that this resolution be placed on the calendar under Rule IX?

Mr. OWEN. I made that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the request preferred by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator ought to do that in the absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who reported the resolution.

Mr. OWEN. I object to the resolution very seriously, and I wish to have an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, the Senator can simply object and let it go over. In the absence of the Senator from Florida, I should think the Senator from Oklahoma would prefer to take that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The statement has been made that the Senator from Florida will be absent for two months on official business. That statement has been made to the Chair by a Senator, and the Chair thinks he saw a statement to that effect in the public press.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order transferring the resolution to Rule IX will be made, in the absence of objection.

That completes the bills on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now take up Senate bill 706.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a bill was reported this morning and went upon the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No doubt the Senator from Georgia will yield to the Senator from Iowa for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if that bill would not properly be a part of the general calendar at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will go upon the calendar to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. I do not insist upon it; but it is a bill that was unanimously reported by the Committee on Indian Depredations—the first bill in the history of that committee—and I thought it would be well to have it considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It all depends upon the unanimous-consent agreement. Did the unanimous-consent agreement contemplate that the Senate should consider bills that are not actually printed on the calendar? What is the understanding of the Senator from Utah on that point?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If that is the case, the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa must be answered in the negative. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 706, to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Georgia will not insist upon that motion at this time. This is a very important bill—a bill which, in the opinion of some members of the Judiciary Committee at least, creates new offices, and, as such, is a delegation of authority to the President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I do not expect to dispose of it this afternoon. I desire to take it up in order to start it on its road. I have no doubt we will have all day to-morrow to discuss it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Do I understand, then, that this will displace the unfinished business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is no unfinished business, and it will become the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not sure that he can agree with the Senator from Georgia about that. There can not be two unfinished businesses before the Senate at the same time. The armor bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the armor bill was displaced before 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The armor bill was displaced temporarily, which, under our practice, carries it over until 2 o'clock to-morrow unless it is sooner called up. That is the meaning of "temporarily laid aside"—that it will not be considered again, except upon specific action, until the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I still desire to take up the judiciary bill, and go as far as we can with it to-night, and go on with it to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And take the chances on taking it up to-morrow?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion this afternoon would not have the effect of making it the unfinished business, even though we might not finish its consideration this afternoon. It would go back to the calendar for such action as the Senate might take regarding it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, there has been some variety of opinion in the last day or two as to whether or not a motion at this time, such as is made by the Senator from Georgia, is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As it is after 2 o'clock, there is not the slightest doubt that it is debatable.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That was my impression when I rose. I started to say that I think this is a bill that ought to receive the most careful and continuous attention of the Senate before it is finally acted upon, because of the very great importance not only of the bill itself but of the constitutional questions involved in the bill. Therefore I think we ought not to take it up by piecemeal, a little this afternoon and a little to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there will be "a little" to-morrow afternoon. It is not expected that the armor bill will be called up to-morrow. I understand from the Senator from South Carolina that he does not expect it to come up to-morrow, and this is the chance to take up this bill and dispose of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am afraid this is not the chance to take up the bill and dispose of it, because I am inclined to believe that this bill, striking as it does at many notions—perhaps ill-conceived notions—as to the constitutionality of it, as well as the political effect of it, may take some considerable time for discussion.

I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, that the bill should be considered; but it is a bill of such very great importance that I believe it ought to be taken up in its own time, and it ought not to be taken up to become the buffer of other bills then pending before the Senate.

We all know how anxious the Members of the Senate are to take up the armor-plate bill, and I consider this bill of far more importance than the armor-plate bill or any temporary measure that may be brought before the Senate. It seems to me that it ought to be taken up so that we may discuss it continuously until it is disposed of, and that it may really be the business before the Senate, and not be taken up in a piecemeal or haphazard sort of a way when the Senate will not be present to hear the discussion.

I hope this bill will not be taken up at this time, when we can have only a little time for discussion to-night and perhaps no time for discussion to-morrow. We can not have two pieces of unfinished business before the Senate at the same time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think we have practically agreed on this side to give this bill the right of way until it can be finished. I am sure the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] does not expect to call up the armor bill to-morrow. I do not know of any speeches to be made on it to-morrow. We have had a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the armor bill Tuesday week, nearly two weeks off. That was done to give time to the two Senators who are out of the city and who desire to speak on the armor bill to return and make their speeches. Are we to displace this bill for two weeks on that account, when other matters can be brought before the Senate?

I submit that we can finish this bill long before we can get to a vote on the armor bill, and this is an excellent opportunity to give it a full, fair discussion. I shall ask to-morrow morning—and I think the request will be supported on this side—that we take up the bill as soon as we meet. I can ask that a recess be taken to-day, in order that the Senator from Wyoming may have all to-day and to-morrow continuously to consider this bill, and if the Senator will join me he can be sure he will have all day to-morrow to consider it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should be very glad if the Senator from Georgia would tell us what other arrangements the Members of the Senate on that side have made as to the time of the Senate, pending the vote upon the armor-plate bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will tell the Senator all that is necessary and all that I know about. I have urged Senators who have other measures that they are pressing to yield, and not to press their measures ahead of this bill for the present, and to give me this opportunity to bring it before the Senate. That is the only arrangement I know of, and it was an entirely legitimate and proper one.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And I told the Senator of it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The only difficulty is that the Senator makes his arrangements as to transacting the business of the Senate with only the Members on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that is a mistake.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I supposed that the Members on this side of the aisle had been aware of the exact arrangement that had been made to lay aside the armor-plate bill, which we were told this morning it was necessary to act upon in haste. If we had known that, probably we would have consented. I certainly should.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken. The arrangement was not made entirely on this side. I acquainted the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] with our plans when he desired to call up the regular calendar. I was prepared to press my motion ahead of the calendar. I have yielded for three hours to that, in order that Senators might have brought up their special bills about which there was no contention. We conferred about it, and I understood that it was pleasing to all of us. While I had the floor, and could have pressed the motion to take up this bill before 2 o'clock, I yielded in order that we might take up the general calendar and dispose of unobjected bills; and, so far as I could, I communicated with Senators on the other side. The agreement that I have, so far as I have any—I do not claim to have a definite agreement—has been rather an earnest request on my part that certain Senators who are pressing other matters should not seek to press them until I had had an opportunity to present this measure to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I had about concluded what I have to say. I simply wanted to enter my most earnest protest against proceeding with a bill of this importance at this time.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to address a question to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I was going to remark that we ought to vote upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia with some kind of an idea, so far as we are able to get it, as to the amount of time that is likely to be consumed in this discussion. This bill comes from the Judiciary Committee, and, of course, I know of the rather marked division that existed in the committee with respect to the bill. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wyoming what information he can give us as to about how long the subject will be likely to be debated upon that side of the Chamber?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am unable to give the Senator any information whatever on that subject. I only know what my course shall be in regard to the bill. I am opposed to the bill and shall have a few remarks to make upon it. The Senator is well aware that I do not consume unnecessary time in the discussion of any bill, nor shall I in the discussion of this bill; but it shall be my purpose, so far as I am personally concerned—and I can speak for no other Member of the Senate—to discuss the bill rather fully, and its effect.

Mr. WALSH. I felt very sure that would be the attitude of the Senator from Wyoming; and I am sure that he will discuss these matters fairly and intelligently and forcefully, as he always does, and then he will cease.

I must say that if any agreement has been made on this side of the Chamber that the time is to be taken up by the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Georgia, I personally was not a party to that agreement, and of course do not feel myself in anywise bound by any such agreement. Whether there was any such agreement or not I am not able to state.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. WALSH. Whether some concourse of Senators upon this side of the Chamber was held, into the deliberations of which I was not admitted, I am unable to say. I should doubt, however, whether my colleagues would dispose of me in just exactly that way, or attempt to do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I insist, sir, that House bill 408 is entitled to whatever time may be available, when the unfinished business is not before the Senate, for discussion and action by this body. I think we have been very decent to our colleagues upon this side in our insistence that that bill come before the Senate. I shall make no more appeals for consideration if such a bill as the one the Senator from Georgia now asks to have taken up is to be considered as entitled to precedence over that measure, which affects the state of industry in 10 great States of this Union. I do not believe a reason can be advanced why the judiciary bill should be given precedence at this time.

I am in favor of the bill urged by the Senator from Georgia. I voted for it in the Judiciary Committee. I hope to vote for it when it comes up. But we shall be obliged to ask for a vote upon the question as to whether that bill shall now have consideration.

Mr. VARDAMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to say just one word in reply to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Montana was not present in the Chamber—at least, if he was here I did not see him—at a time when, unexpectedly to all of us, or certainly unexpectedly to me, we found that the armor-plate bill would not really go on to-day. I spoke to certain associates of his who were interested in the bill in which he is also interested; and I qualified my own statement from the statement that there was an agreement in the statement that at my earnest request they consent that I should make this motion. The Senator from Montana was in no way a party to it, and I certainly did not mean for a moment to intimate that he was. I qualified my statement about the agreement, lest it should be understood to have been intended by me to apply to all Senators on this side. It was rather a request by myself to certain of his associates that I might bring up this matter and press it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not in any way claim that they were bound not to vote for their own measures if they saw fit. It was rather that I should present this motion first.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do.

Mr. MYERS. So far as any agreement amongst any concourse of Senators is concerned, I know nothing about it. I will say that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] talked to me several times to-day very earnestly about desiring to get up for the remainder of the day the bill which he has moved to take up; and after he had talked with me several times on the matter I finally told him that as far as I was concerned, speaking for myself and no one else, I would make no opposition to his endeavor to get up his bill for the remainder of to-day. I spoke for one day only. I did not say what I would do to-morrow, or some other day, or any other day. I told him that as far as this day was concerned, if he wanted to get up the bill I would make no opposition to it for this day, or to his getting it before the Senate for the balance of this day if the armor-plate bill should be laid aside.

So far as accommodating fellow-Senators is concerned by giving way, I will say that to-day at 12 o'clock I was ready and disposed to renew my fight to bring up House bill 408, and to use every endeavor in my power to get it ahead of the armor-plate bill. I do not engage in a great many fights, but when I do engage in a fight I am disposed to go ahead with it and not to give up or back up. My inclination and disposition to-day was very strongly to go ahead with the fight that I inaugurated last evening and fight it to a finish to-day, and let the Senate decide the result. But at the very earnest request of a number of Democratic Senators, including my colleague [Mr. WALSH], I yielded my own judgment on the matter and gave up my intention.

When it comes to giving in to one Senator or giving in to another, when you start giving in it is pretty hard to draw the line. I had given in, at the urgent solicitation of a number of Senators, to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] for what I felt was to be a prolonged fight, and think yet will probably be a prolonged fight; and when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] conferred with me several times to-day and urged me very earnestly not to oppose the proposition of allowing him the remnant of one day, having started out the day with a charitable spirit of giving in I kept it up, so far as the Senator from Georgia was concerned, as to the remnant of this one day. At least I told him that I personally would not oppose him in his efforts for this day only, so far as I was concerned. I started out the day in a charitable frame of mind, and, I suppose, concluded that it would be well to keep it up and to live at least one day in that frame of mind.

That is just exactly what transpired between me and the Senator from Georgia. I did not consult anybody else about it, and I do not know whether any one else agrees with me or not, but that is my attitude in the matter, and it is limited to this day only.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the lateness of the hour and the great amount of work accomplished by the Senate to-day will cause me to make brief the remarks which I shall submit, and not trespass upon the patience of this body longer than possible. I am not going to discuss the question of whether or not we should take up the bill proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but I am going to talk about another question of vastly more importance.

In the outset I am going to ask permission to insert in my remarks the correspondence between the Senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and the President of the United States on the subject of Americans traveling on armed merchant ships belonging to belligerent nations, together with certain extracts from the diplomatic history of this country where the Congress has taken part in the diplomatic intercourse between this and other nations, and also the resolution introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], in its original form and the amended resolution which was laid on the table. (See Appendix.)

Mr. President, the time has arrived when Members of this Congress, confronted with an emergency pregnant with issues of grave and far-reaching consequences, should speak their minds candidly, but with that prudent reserve which always characterizes the acts of wisdom. Where so much is at stake it is dangerous to speculate; but in the twilight of doubt, under the shadow of uncertainty, the attrition of ideas and friction of suggestions when freely made can with safety be depended upon to produce the light which will lead us to the essential truth. The vanity of opinion, the pride of place, the exigencies of politics, or the prestige of power should not influence a Member of Congress in the performance of a great and patriotic duty. I belong to a school of Democrats who believe profoundly in the philosophy of party organization and the patriotism of party discipline. It is my deliberate judgment that, through the instrumentality of the Democratic Party, guided by the ancient landmarks of that organization, that free government in America is to be preserved. A vital tenet in the Democratic faith is the upholding and maintenance of the Government in the form and purpose of its original construction.

The wise framers of the Constitution, who "dipped into the future far as human eye could see," recognized the virtue of a division of authority, and therefore created the three coordinate branches of the Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The functions of these various departments have been clearly defined and are well understood and recognized by the Members of this body. We all agree that the encroachment by one department upon the rights and prerogatives of another department must necessarily serve to disorganize and disturb the entire fabric. It is therefore prudent that the equilibrium should at all times be maintained perfectly. Far be it from any purpose on my part to have the Congress interfere with the executive functions of the Government or trench in any way upon the sacred rights or prerogatives of the White House.

There is no danger, I apprehend, of the legislative department of the Government usurping any of the powers that belong to the executive department. But there is danger of the President dominating and controlling the Congress in a way not contemplated by the builders of the Constitution. I have been apprehensive at times that Executive interference with the legislative function is one of the real menaces to the permanency of our system of government. The votes that have been taken by the Congress in the last few days on the question of permitting American citizens to travel on belligerent merchant ships, I respectfully submit, were not votes of confidence, but, rather, votes of obedience; they were not votes of counsel, expressing the convictions of the individual Congressman upon this grave question, but, rather, I fear, in many instances, but the sullen, silent submission to what was thought to be the demands of the presidential will and to meet the exigencies of party politics. There is beauty in the symmetry of our system of government, and we all recognize that there is strength in the perfect order of its construction. Mr. President, I wish it were possible for the legislative and executive departments of this Government, especially in times of stress like the present, to deal with each other with perfect candor and in a spirit of cooperation rather than of antagonism. There should not be the slightest friction or conflict of interests. When the ends to be reached are the same and the responsibilities are equal there is every reason why there should be perfect cooperation and the subject treated by the Executive and the Congress on the dead level of equality. Let it be understood and proclaimed to the world that the President of the United States is not the master of Congress or the ruler of this Republic, nor is there a divinity which hedges him about that renders him immune from error. And it is equally important that we should not lose sight of the truth that the Congress is in no way superior or paramount to the executive department. But they are coordinate branches, each created and designed to serve the American people, the masters of us all. I shall not refrain from stating, lest I be charged with being academic or indulging in the repetition of an ancient platitude, the vital truth, that the source of all political power is with the people, and therefore the people have a right to know what their Representatives in Congress and the President may do, and, so far as possible, the motives behind their every official act. I believe that it would be a godsend to America if the blessed sunlight of publicity might be permitted to shine upon every official act of every officer of this Government and throw upon the canvas of time in vivid portrayal the motives behind such acts.

Men in high official stations are often unnecessarily sensitive or jealous of the honor and dignity of their particular functions. Too often vanity beclouds the vision and personal ambition dulls the sense of duty. We are too inclined to regard the office which we hold temporarily as our private property rather than a trust, whose functions we are called upon to perform for the good of the people. When the resolution was introduced in the Senate a few days ago by the learned Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and a resolution of similar import was introduced in the House of Representatives by the Hon. Mr. MCLEMORE, of Texas, the cry went up in solemn and foreboding tones from those who seem to feel it their God-imposed duty to protect the Executive function from any possible encroachment by the Members of the coordinate branch, contending that the passage of such a resolution would be taken by the President—in truth, I think the President said something like that himself—and construed by the nations of the earth as an abridgment of the President's power, and some seemed to think, it might possibly be taken as a reflection upon his imputed infallibility.

They claim that the Presidency is an office created by the Constitution and vested solely with the power of conducting all diplomatic negotiations and charged with the duty of attending to all matters similar to the questions embodied in the resolution introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma. Of course I do not agree to such a contention. It is unauthorized by the terms of the Constitution and contradicted by the precedents of history. Congress in the past has not hesitated to advise and counsel with the Executive in matters of great importance similar to the question at issue to-day. It was done during the administration of President Andrew Jackson, in the official lifetime of Henry Clay, and before and since. There is nothing new or novel in the proposition, and it has the approval of common sense and tested by time and trial. Now, I am perfectly willing, however, to concede, for the sake of this discussion, that the President thinks he is vested solely with the power which he arrogates to himself in his letter to the honorable senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I am going to concede to the President all the power and dignity, and I shall not detract or derogate in any way from the exercise of that power which the Constitution confers upon him. I am perfectly willing that he shall go to the end of his constitutional tether. Nor shall I, as a Senator, presume to advise him personally as to how he should perform the functions of his place, or submit to him any suggestion as to what he should do, unless he should solicit such assistance.

But, Mr. President, I am not willing to delegate to the President or any other officer the right to perform a duty devolving upon me which means as much to the American people as is involved in the issue which confronts the country to-day. I am not willing to leave to the discretion of the President or any other officer to say whether American citizens shall be permitted upon merchantmen belonging to belligerent countries, when we have been told by the President that if a person thus traveling should lose his life by the sinking of the merchantman by a German submarine that he would consider it a gross violation of international law, and I think I am within the facts of recent history when I say he intimated that the breaking off of diplomatic relations with Germany would follow. I am not willing to submit even to the President a matter of such vital moment to the people of Mississippi and America when I have assurance that he would decide the question against what I believe to be their best interests. And in taking this position I should dislike for anybody to conclude that it is because of a lack of confidence in the President's honesty or done in a spirit of hostility.

I have an impression, created by what has happened in the last few months, that the President distinctly leans toward the allies in the European conflict, and whatever he may think his duty in the premises I am sure he will do, just as I am not going to leave undone anything which should be done, that I have a right to do, and which is my duty to do as a Member of this Congress, that would render impossible an unnecessary war with any of the belligerent powers of Europe. If I may be pardoned for the diversion, I want to say just here, that I have the greatest admiration and respect for the learning of the extraordinary man who is the present Executive head of this Republic. He has written some good books—splendid books; he is familiar with the history of the rise and fall of civilizations, whose skeletons mark the shores of time; he knows the causes that produced them, and he is doubtless familiar with the influences that caused their disintegration and downfall. But, even conceding all that, I do not think he possesses a corner on all political wisdom, nor do I believe that he is any more patriotic than the majority of the Members of Congress, who share with him the responsibility of this Government. I might concede to him all the qualities with which the perfervid love-tinted imaginations of his self-constituted, special senatorial defenders, partisan friends, and devoted adherents in Congress clothe him, but even then, Mr. President, I should still be in favor of the Congress exercising its proper function and not leave all the responsibility of the Government to the President. The President is a mere man, whose heart is filled with the hopes and hates, loves and limitations, fears and forebodings, favoritisms and fancies incident to mortality. His brain is the storehouse of ambitions, vanities, virtues, faults, and frailties that belong to the human race. Only a man—just a man—that's all. And I realize that he can not do anything that will not affect for weal or woe the Nation, and I am also mindful of the fact, which is of concern to me, that upon his conduct very largely the immediate future success or failure of the Democratic Party depends. It is therefore my desire to help, not hinder; to build up, not tear down. But, Mr. President, God forbid that partisan politics should have any place in the consideration of this great question. We should rise above such influences as the sun rises above the fog. If there ever was a time in the history of this Republic when "none should be for party" but "all for the state" that time is now. Viewing it, there should be no Democratic or Republican standpoints; but it should be viewed and contemplated solely from the coign of vantage of the highest and purest patriotism and statesmanship to which a Member of the American Congress is capable of attaining.

Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers—
And I linger on the shore—
And the individual withers;
And the world is more and more.

Having stated this much, I trust that my position may not be misunderstood. The person who would for any reason or purpose put me in the attitude of personal hostility or official antagonism to the President makes a mistake which is discreditable to his judgment, and is an imputation of dishonor upon himself which injures him and does not hurt me. Mr. President, I do not think it should be taken as an act of treason for a United States Senator to differ from the President in a matter of public policy, especially if the Senator shall stand upon the Democratic platform and in accordance with the genius, history, and traditions of the party to which he owes allegiance. Their responsibilities are equal. They derive their authority from the same source, and the obligation is equally binding upon each to do and stand for the things that will promote the interests of the people. Submission to any power or influences other than the demands of duty involves a base repudiation of the first paramount obligation of a Senator. This Nation is confronted with a grave problem; the war cloud is rising above the horizon and its lightning flashes have inflamed the hearts of our people. The blighting simoom of war sweeps across the Old World, and the fair fields of Europe have been laid waste. Great cities—the monuments of a nation's superb civilization, the growth of ages past—have been razed to the earth, and the vine-clad hills and fragrant groves, vocal with the songs of birds, have been converted into veritable Golgothas, with moaning in the winds and tears of weeping women and children form the dewdrops upon the flowers, while the nations throughout the world, like wild beasts, are "snarling at each other's heels." For some time after the beginning of hostilities in Europe our isolation—the wide sea between our Government and the scenes of the deadly conflict—gave our people a sense of security, and that sense of security was deepened by the precautions taken by the Chief Magistrate, who went so far as to warn the American people, even in picture shows, to withhold their expressions of partiality when war scenes were flashed upon the screens. But the disaster is spreading. The flames that are consuming Europe are throwing their sparks across the dividing ocean, and the sense of security which a few months ago we enjoyed has given way to soul-disturbing apprehensions. The opportunities for investment, the greed for gain, the cupidity which is eating out the hearts of a certain class of citizens in some sections of this Republic, the bad advice of such individuals who are enjoying enormous profits from the manufacture of munitions of war, together with the public press, which has become the active agent of the harpies of predatory interests and is now engaged in the diabolical work of inculcating false sentiments, to the end that their masters may, from the wreck and carnage of war, grow richer still and fill their capacious coffers with gold coined of the blood and tears, the sufferings and sacrifices of the victims of war.

Now, let us see what the issue really is. Let us look at it and consider it in its due proportions, divested of all false coloring, and clear out of our eyes the vanity that seems to distort our mental vision. First, do the people of America want war? Has an exigency arisen or anything happened which makes it necessary that we should go to war with any foreign power in Europe or justify any other nation in declaring war against us? And if not, is it not the sacred duty of Congress, in the performance of its sovereign function, to remove every possible irritating cause and render war improbable? From my viewpoint—and I have endeavored to consider this matter in all its phases—the only probable excuse for war that I am able to discern at this time is the fact that some American traveling upon the high seas on a merchantman belonging to a belligerent nation may lose his life by the sinking of such a ship by a submarine belonging to the German Government. There may be other causes that possibly may bring about war, but if so, they have not been hinted at or mentioned in this exhaustive discussion. So we may take it as admitted that the real question at issue is the right of the American citizen to travel upon armed merchant ships belonging to a belligerent nation and the wisdom or the prudence of the American Government permitting it. I am perfectly willing for the sake of this discussion to admit that an American citizen has the technical right, vouchsafed to him by international law, to travel upon merchant ships, armed or unarmed, belonging to a belligerent nation.

I am going to consent to the further proposition that they have the right to travel upon these ships and if the Congress by solemn enactment, does not limit or abridge that right, or authorize the President of the United States to withhold protection if the right shall be exercised—in other words, if notice is not given—it is the duty of the Government of the United States to throw around such traveler the ægis of its protection and hold the nation which violates the law to a strict accounting for the injury that such citizen may suffer. Now, admitting that, I want to go a little further and say that while the American citizen has the right under international law to do the things I have detailed, would it not be wise? Would it not be prudent? Would it not be an act of humanity and a service to mankind if this Congress, chosen by the people to write their laws, should see to it that citizens of the United States—owing allegiance to our flag—should not be permitted to exercise the privilege even though it be vouchsafed to them under international law, which in so doing would necessarily involve this country in war with Germany or some other country, the result of which we all understand, would mean the loss of billions of dollars to the wealth producers of America and probably the sacrifice of millions of human lives? Mr. President, is this vaunted privilege, vouchsafed by an ancient international custom, superior and paramount to an act by the Congress and the Executive charged with the control of the Government? Is the interest of an irresponsible, imprudent, vagrant, fool-hardy creature, knowing the perils of the sea, to outweigh with the Congress the peace and happiness of 100,000,000 of prosperous and law-abiding people? Is it fair, is it just, is it reasonable, is it humane that these few irresponsible, notoriety-loving individuals should be permitted to involve this country in a war, the horrible consequences of which words may be inadequate to describe? To my mind there is but one answer to the question. Oh, but it is maintained by the President and those who are defending his views in this Chamber that America must preserve international law. That the seas must be kept open, trade untrammeled, and commerce unhindered between the nations must be maintained. That sentiment sounds fine to the fellow who enjoys the profits. It reminds one of the patriotic utterances of Patrick Henry and other heroes, whose heroism have made American history glorious, only because it is so different. It is merely stage thunder, the rattling of the tin and the flash of the red lights behind the curtain. There is not in it the real music of the heavens—the symphony of the spheres. It is the manufactured article intended more to promote the interests, enlarge the profits of the Wall Street patriot, the commercial bandit, the financial buccaneer, than it is for the conservation of the vital principles of international law and the protection of human lives.

If the question were submitted to the American people to-day as to whether or not the United States should go to war with Germany for the sinking of a merchantman belonging to Great Britain with an American citizen upon it, is there a Senator in this Chamber, is there a reasonable, patriotic man on this continent who believes that the American people would vote to permit this vagrant citizen to travel on belligerent merchant ships if they knew it meant war for the United States? Do you believe there is a mother in America who would be willing to offer her son upon the altar of such a cause? Is there a loving wife who would give her husband to be sacrificed that the rights of such a reckless individual might be upheld, or that the ancient principle of international law, which has long since become obsolete, might be vindicated? Oh, no; you know they would not. There is no question about that. There is no difference of opinion between us on this subject. I believe I have as much reverence for the American flag as any man who lives beneath its sacred folds. I yield to no man in my devotion to America, my reverence for its past, and my hope for its future. I want the flag of our Nation to float as an emblem of courage, of honor, of justice, and of humanity. I would not, knowingly, do anything, or permit anything to be done, or left undone that should be done, to preserve the independence, the integrity, and the honor of this Government. It is my Government. Every fiber of my being, every impulse of my soul, every pulsation of my heart beats in unison with its every purpose and pleads for the fulfillment of its great destiny. And for that reason, Mr. President, I shall not dishonor that flag and I shall not betray my Government by a failure on my part to take every necessary precaution against unnecessary, unprovoked, and unjustifiable war. I should not knowingly, not even to save my own life, do anything or leave anything undone that is necessary to be done, to save the American people from the horrors of war. I shall not be intimidated by the mendacious newspaper editors who are the servile tools of that greedy gang of Government wreckers, who would coin the blood and tears of the men, women, and children of this Republic into dollars that they may grow richer and richer still. I despise the slander, the detraction, the villification of that class of people who are patriots for pelf, who are partisans for plunder, and who would make the flag of the United States the flag of the pirate or the ensign of the privateer. I received an anonymous letter from some craven creature who signed himself "A Mississippian," in which he criticized me for being an "advocate of peace at any price." The soul-sodden, dollar-hearted, brain-owned emissary of adversity charged me with having betrayed the Democratic Party; that I had proven false to "the President of my party." I hurl back into the teeth of such a creature the statement and denounce it as absolutely false. There is not enough of the element of truth in the statement to make a respectable falsehood.

Mr. President, I do not have to defend my loyalty to America and my fealty to the Democratic Party or my adherence to the platform promises. That has been attested in every vote I have cast since I came to the United States Senate. If there be one instance in all my legislative career—which is short and unimportant in this body—where I have deviated one iota from the Democratic confession of faith, where I have violated a single plank in the Democratic platform to which I owe allegiance, I challenge any man to point it out. I have kept the faith without variableness or shadow of turning, and fulfilled every promise made to my constituents, so far as it was possible for me to do so. I am not for peace at any price. I am not afraid to fight for the right, and I am not afraid to refuse to fight for the wrong or have my country go to war without just cause even though the Chief Magistrate of this Republic should order me to do so. I should not hesitate to vote in this body to commit my country to a policy which I knew would lead the Nation to war if the question of honor, the question of principle, and the rights of the American people were involved. Mindful of the sacred trust committed to my keeping as a Member of the Congress of the United States, I feel that—

> A valiant man
> Ought not to undergo, or tempt a danger,
> But worthily, and by selected ways.
> He undertakes with reason, not by chance.
> His valor is the salt t' his other virtues,
> They're all unseasoned without it.

Mr. President, If I may be permitted or pardoned the personal reference, as an expression of the respect and reverence I bear for the memory of my ancestors, permit me to say, that in every war in which this Republic has engaged some member of my family, in whose veins coursed my own life current, contributed to the sacredness of the American soil by feeding the dry sand with their precious blood. Their honorable records will not be dishonored by their sons. I have three sons, all of whom are of military age, and should their country need their services to defend the flag, it would be a source of humiliation and disappointment to me, a humiliation which I have no fear, however, of ever being called upon to suffer, if either one of them should fail to respond to the first call of the Nation's need. But feeling that way about it, it in no way lessens my obligation to do everything honorable to save my country from the horrors of war. I would not sacrifice one American youth and becloud the heart of his sainted mother with the sorrows which his death would bring—I would not draw from the eyes of one good American wife the tears of grief shed over the death of her patriotic husband for all the money in America. And I am not unmindful of the value of riches, either. I realize the importance of the protection of American business rights, but the dollars to be made by the manufacturers of munitions of war or the sale of other forms of merchandise to the belligerents of Europe are to me, when compared with the value of one human soul, as a grain of sand in weight to the rock-ribbed, snow-capped mountain of the West.

If the belligerent countries of Europe desire to purchase American goods, let them come and get them. But I shall never consent to go to war because some venturesome, foolhardy creature, hired, possibly, to sail upon the British ship as a mascot to protect it against the assault of an enemy engaged in a death grapple. If the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma had been adopted by the Congress as it was originally introduced, in my judgment, the probabilities of war with Germany would have vanished as a nightmare from the troubled brain of innocence. And I am sorry the Senator from Oklahoma did not allow the resolution, as originally introduced, to be voted on. If I had been in the honorable Senator's stead, I should have forced a vote upon it. I should have held my flag in the air until it was shot from my hands. But he saw fit to do otherwise, and I have no criticism to offer for his conduct. But I am not sure we would have war even if an American citizen should lose his life on a belligerent merchant ship. It might result in the severance of diplomatic relations between Germany and the United States, but even then, I am not sure that war would follow. Germany has shown a disposition to do well nigh any and every thing demanded by the United States in order to avoid war, and it is my deliberate judgment that if we should have war with Germany, and God forbid that we may, it will be after Germany has made every possible concession to avoid it. Germany has been quite as respectful and observed the rules of international law in her dealings with the United States as the allies. Really Germany has been more observant and respectful of international law than the allies. She could not have shown greater contempt or disregard for international law and the rights of the American people on the high seas than Great Britain has shown. Great Britain's policy in interfering with commerce on the high seas in violation of international law, which she herself helped to write, has cost the cotton growers of the South on the crops of 1914 and 1915 not less than seven hundred millions of dollars. But that fact does not affect in any way my views upon the pending question. It is also my deliberate judgment that some of the gentlemen who hold the bonds of the allies and are probably carrying large accounts against the allies for munitions of war would be very glad to see the United States drawn into this vortex of slaughter and death. Meetings are being held in some of the Eastern States urging the United States to take action. Some of the hired organs of the bondholders and munition manufacturers are taunting the people of the United States with being cowards, and saying that Great Britain and the allies are fighting America's battles. It has been intimated that there is a leaning or sympathy in high official circles in Washington toward the allies, and I do not hesitate to say that unless this Congress takes affirmative action looking to the prohibition of Americans from riding on belligerent ships, there is a possibility; aye, more, a probability that the United States Government, under pretext of defending the rights of the American citizen, will be drawn into this horrible maelstrom.

Mr. President, I feel very deeply on this subject. The time has arrived, I think, when men charged with the great responsibility with which the Members of this body are charged, that their minds should be expressed prudently and freely, and the things needful to be done should be done, notwithstanding the fact that it may displease the holders of the Anglo-French bonds, the manufacturers of munitions of war, and a few men in high official stations. Now, I want to say in conclusion, that I have no desire to encroach upon the prerogatives of the President. I would not take from him one iota of his constitutional prerogative. I would not impute to him unpatriotic or improper motives. He, in all probability, will act in accordance with what he believes to be for the better interests of the American people. That which I concede to him I trust I may with modesty be permitted to arrogate to myself.

My position on this question is not one of antagonism to the President, but rather one of cooperation and help. I am only doing that which I believe to be in the interests of the American people. I am trying to serve them as they deserve to be served. My first duty is to them, and I am going to perform that duty as my sense of right may dictate, regardless of the personal consequences. It is very much more important that America should be kept out of war with honor than it is that I should flatter the vanity, glorify the prestige, or apotheosize any individual regardless of the position which he holds. If this country should become involved in war with Germany on account of the failure of this Congress to take such action as may be necessary to prohibit Americans from traveling on ships belonging to belligerent nations, the blood of every soldier that shall be sacrificed in that conflict will be on the hands of the Members of this Congress. Every tear shed by broken-hearted mothers and grief-stricken wives ought to burn like molten lead upon the souls of the Members of this body who, through indiscretion or imprudence, fail to do the things needful to avoid it. Every pang of pain, every impulse of anguish, every heartache of the orphaned children that may be made by such a war will live accusing spirits to haunt the Members of this Congress and the President of the United States to the end of time.

No, Mr. President, I am not antagonistic to the President of the United States, who happens to be also the head of the political party to which I acknowledge allegiance, except in the matter and on the questions in which and about which I think he is wrong. Just that far and no further do I oppose the President. And just that far and no further ought I to oppose the President. Any other course for me would be dishonorable. But I prefer to describe my attitude to the President, however, as being more a difference of opinion than one of antagonism. I do not hesitate to say that to follow the lead of the President in the matter of prohibiting by law Americans to travel on belligerent merchant ships involves a violation of my every idea of duty to my constituents. It involves a violation of my sense of loyalty to the right and a betrayal of the American people. The sacrifice is too great to ask a self-respecting American Congressman to make. I will not be guilty of such a perfidious crime against my own conscience. Public office has no charm for me, if to hold it I must sacrifice the priceless jewels of my soul.

What conscience dictates to be done
Or warns me not to do,
This teach me more than hell to shun
That more than heaven pursue.

Mr. President—

Though every leaf were a tongue to cry Thou must,
I will not say the unjust thing is just.

APPENDIX.

GORE RESOLUTION AS MODIFIED.

Whereas a number of leading powers of the world are now engaged in a war of unexampled proportions; and
Whereas the United States is happily at peace with all of the belligerent nations; and
Whereas it is equally the desire and the interest of the American people to remain at peace with all nations; and
Whereas the President has recently afforded fresh and signal proofs of the superiority of diplomacy to butchery as a method of settling international disputes; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on unarmed belligerent vessels has recently received renewed guaranties of respect and inviolability; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on armed belligerent vessels rather than upon unarmed vessels is essential neither to their life, liberty, or safety, nor to the independence, dignity, or security of the United States; and
Whereas Congress alone has been vested with the power to declare war, which involves the obligations to prevent war by all proper means consistent with the honor and vital interest of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the sinking by a German submarine without notice or warning of an armed merchant vessel of her public enemy, resulting in the death of a citizen of the United States, would constitute a just and sufficient cause of war between the United States and the German Empire.

GORE RESOLUTION AS INTRODUCED.

Whereas a number of leading powers of the world are now engaged in a war of unexampled proportions; and
Whereas the United States is happily at peace with all of the belligerent nations; and
Whereas it is equally the desire and the interest of the American people to remain at peace with all nations; and
Whereas the President has recently afforded fresh and signal proofs of the superiority of diplomacy to butchery as a method of settling international disputes; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on unarmed belligerent vessels has recently received renewed guaranties of respect and inviolability; and
Whereas the right of American citizens to travel on armed belligerent vessels rather than upon unarmed vessels is essential neither to their life, liberty, or safety, nor to the independence, dignity, or security of the United States; and
Whereas Congress alone has been vested with the power to declare war, which involves the obligations to prevent war by all proper means consistent with the honor and vital interest of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress, vested as it is with the sole power to declare war, that all persons owing allegiance to the United States should, in behalf of their own safety and the vital interest of the United States, forbear to exercise the right to travel as passengers upon any armed vessel of any belligerent power, whether such vessel be armed for offensive or defensive purposes; and it is the further sense of the Congress that no passport should be isued or renewed by the Secretary of State or by anyone acting under him to be used by any person owing allegiance to the United States for purpose of travel upon any such armed vessel of a belligerent power.

WILSON TO POU—THE LETTER THAT SURPRISED ALL.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 29, 1916.

MY DEAR MR. POU: Inasmuch as I learn that Mr. HENRY, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, is absent in Texas, I take the liberty of calling your attention, as ranking member of the committee, to a matter of grave concern to the country which can, I believe, be handled, under the rules of the House, only by that committee.

The report that there are divided counsels in Congress in regard to the foreign policy of the Government is being made industrious use of in foreign capitals. I believe that report to be false, but so long as it is anywhere credited it can not fail to do the greatest harm and expose the country to the most serious risks. I therefore feel justified in asking that your committee will permit me to urge an early vote upon the resolutions with regard to travel on armed merchantmen which have recently been so much talked about in order that there may be afforded an immediate opportunity for full public discussion and action upon them and that all doubts and conjectures may be swept away and our foreign relations once more cleared of damaging misunderstandings.

The matter is of so grave importance and lies so clearly within the field of Executive initiative that I venture to hope that your committee will not think that I am taking unwarranted liberty in making this suggestion as to the business of the House, and I very earnestly commend it to their immediate attention.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

STONE TO PRESIDENT.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Since Senator KERN, Mr. FLOOD, and I talked with you on Monday evening I am more troubled than I have been for many a day. I have not felt authorized to repeat our conversation, but I have attempted, in response to numerous inquiries from my colleagues, to state to them, within the confidence that they should observe, my general understanding of your attitude. I have stated my understanding of your attitude to be substantially as follows:

REPEATS WILSON'S VIEWS.

That while you would deeply regret the rejection by Great Britain of Mr. Lansing's proposal for the disarmament of merchant vessels of the allies with the understanding that Germany and her allies would not fire upon a merchant ship if she hauled to when summoned, not attempting to escape, and that the German warships would only exercise the admitted right of visitation and capture, and would not destroy the captured ship except in circumstances that reasonably assured the safety of passengers and crew, you were of the opinion that if Great Britain and her allies rejected the proposal and insisted upon arming her merchant ships she would be within her right under international law. Also that you would feel disposed to allow armed vessels to be cleared from our ports; also that you are not favorably disposed to the idea of this Government taking any definite steps toward preventing American citizens from embarking upon armed merchant vessels.

Furthermore, that you would consider it your duty, if a German warship should fire upon an armed merchant vessel of the enemy upon which American citizens were passengers, to hold Germany to strict account.

Numerous Members of the Senate and the House have called to discuss this subject with me. I have felt that the Members of the two Houses who are to deal with this grave question were entitled to know the situation we are confronting as I understand it to be.

I think I should say to you that the Members of both Houses feel deeply concerned and disturbed by what they read and hear. I have heard of some talk to the effect that some are saying that, after all, it may be possible that the program of preparedness, so called, has some relation to such a situation as we are now called upon to meet.

I have counseled all who have talked with me to keep cool; that this whole business is still the subject of diplomacy, and that you are striving to the utmost to bring about some peaceable adjustment; and that in the meantime Congress should be careful not to "ball up" a diplomatic situation by any kind of hasty and ill-considered action. However, the situation in Congress is such as to excite a sense of deep concern in the minds of careful and thoughtful men. I have felt that it is due to you to say this much.

AMOUNTS TO MORAL TREASON.

I think you understand my personal attitude with respect to this subject. As much and as deeply as I would hate to radically disagree with you, I find it difficult for my sense of duty and responsibility to consent to plunge this Nation into the vortex of this world war because of the unreasonable obstinacy of any of the powers, upon the one hand, or, on the other hand, of foolhardiness, amounting to a sort of moral treason against the Republic, of our people recklessly risking their lives on armed belligerent ships. I can not escape the conviction that such would be so monstrous as to be indefensible.

WANTS TO UPHOLD WILSON.

I want to be with you and to stand by you, and I mean to do so up to the last limit; and I want to talk with you and Secretary Lansing with the utmost frankness—to confer with you and have your judgment and counsel—and I want to be kept advised as to the course of events, as it seems to me I am entitled to be. In the meantime I am striving to prevent anything being done by any Senator or Member calculated to embarrass your diplomatic negotiations. Up to the last you should be left free to act diplomatically as you think for the best to settle the questions involved. I need hardly say that my wish is to help, not to hinder, you.

With the highest regard and most sympathetic consideration, I have the honor, Mr. President, to be,

Very sincerely, yours, WM. J. STONE.

WILSON TO STONE.

FEBRUARY 24, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I very warmly appreciate your kind and frank letter of to-day, and feel that it calls for an equally frank reply.

You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. I think the country will feel no uneasiness about my course in that respect.

Through many anxious months I have striven for that object, amidst difficulties more manifold than can have been apparent upon the surface, and so far I have succeeded. I do not doubt that I shall continue to succeed.

The course which the central European powers have announced their intention of following in the future with regard to undersea warfare seems for the moment to threaten insuperable obstacles, but its apparent meaning is so manifestly inconsistent with explicit assurances recently given us by these powers, with regard to their treatment of merchant vessels on the high seas, that I must believe that explanations will presently ensue which will put a different aspect upon it.

CAN NOT QUESTION FAITH.

We have had no reason to question their good faith or their fidelity to their promises in the past and I, for one, feel confident that we shall have none in the future.

But in any event our duty is clear. No nation, no group of nations, has the right while war is in progress to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war; and if the clear rights of American citizens should ever unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action, we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course should be.

For my own part, I can not consent to any abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect. The honor and self-respect of the Nation is involved. We covet peace and shall preserve it at any cost but the loss of honor.

To forbid our people to exercise their rights for fear we might be called upon to vindicate them would be a deep humiliation indeed. It would be an implicit, all but an explicit, acquiescence in the violation of the rights of mankind everywhere and of whatever nation or allegiance. It would be a deliberate abdication of our hitherto proud position as spokesman, even amid the turmoil of war, for the law and the right.

It would make everything this Government has attempted and everything that it has achieved during this terrible struggle of nations meaningless and futile.

FEARS MORE CONCESSIONS.

It is important to reflect that if in this instance we allowed expediency to take the place of principle the door would inevitably be opened to still further concessions.

Once accept a single abatement of right and many other humiliations would certainly follow, and the whole fine fabric of international law might crumble under our hands, piece by piece. What we are contending for in this matter is of the very essence of the things that have made America a sovereign Nation. She can not yield them without conceding her own impotency as a Nation and making virtual surrender of her independent position among the nations of the world.

I am speaking, my dear Senator, in deep solemnity, without heat, with a clear consciousness of the high responsibilities of my office, and as your sincere and devoted friend. If we should unhappily differ, we shall differ as friends; but where issues so momentous as these are involved we must, just because we are friends, speak our minds without reservation.

Faithfully, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been yielding all the afternoon to the wishes of other Senators, so as to facilitate their getting up the short matters that are on the calendar, and I am going to yield again to the views of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], so far as pressing the motion I made this afternoon; but as I shall renew that motion to-morrow morning, and, if I have the opportunity, renew it before 2 o'clock, at a time when I can say nothing in behalf of the motion, I wish to state at this time that the bill I am pressing has been recommended by three Attorneys General. It was recommended by Mr. Justice McReynolds when he was Attorney General, and it has been twice recommended by the present Attorney General. It is a bill that the Department of Justice thinks of great importance and of great value in the administration of justice.

I hope the Senate to-morrow morning, if I shall succeed in obtaining an opportunity to make the motion, will give us an opportunity to consider the bill. I am advised by one of the Senators in charge of the armor-plate bill that he knows of no Senator who wishes to speak upon that bill to-morrow, or possibly even on Saturday. I am satisfied, if the Senate takes the bill up, we can have at least a continuous discussion all day to-morrow upon it, and I hope this will meet the wishes of the Senator from Wyoming. Now, I understand that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] desires to move an executive session.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before that motion is made, I desire to submit a request. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, of which I am chairman, have under consideration certain retirement bills, and I have in my hand a report of the Commission on Economy and Efficiency on the subject of the retirement from the classified civil service of superannuated employees, which was submitted in the form of a message by former President Taft, and is known as Document No. 782. I understand that it is out of print, and I ask that this matter be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having another edition printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

CERTIFICATES OF PASSENGER-CARRYING VESSELS.

Mr. CHILTON obtained the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, when Calendar No. 104, being the bill (S. 1222) to amend section 4464 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was reached upon the calendar, I asked that it go over. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I had a conversation with that Senator before he left the city, and he assured me that he would not object to the bill being sent back to the Committee on Commerce. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHILTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BROWN, OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., Member of the House of Representatives from the second congressional district of West Virginia, died a few hours ago at his residence in this city. He had been a Member of the House since 1911, and was the oldest in service of the membership of that body from my State.

To me this is a personal bereavement; to my State and his district it is a signal loss; and when I think of his dependent family and his circle of devoted friends at home I fail to find words to express the depths of my sympathy. He was an able, earnest, effective man and public servant, a reliable friend, a public-spirited citizen, and a devoted husband and father.

At some future time I shall ask the Senate to set apart a day when appropriate memorial services may be held that his friends here may express their appreciation of his public and private life.

I now offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions (S. Res. 124), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., late a Representative from the State of West Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the provision of the second resolution the Chair appoints, as the committee on the part of the Senate, Mr. CHILTON, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. JAMES, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. GOFF, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. CUMMINS, and Mr. CLAPP.

Mr. CHILTON. I also offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 10, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

REJECTION.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate March 9, 1916.

M. W. A. Murray to be postmaster at Parkers Prairie, Minn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 9, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Jehovah, infinite in all Thy resources, revealed in the works of Thy hands, in the progress of mankind, in the inspired Word, in the precepts, example, and incomparable life of the Jesus of Nazareth, pour out Thy holy influence upon us, that we may be wise in our conceptions, firm in our convictions, pure in our motives; that we may be the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of Thy plans and purposes, and, departing, leave behind us an example worthy of emulation. In His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose at its last sitting, a point of order was made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to the following words in line 17, page 119 of the bill:

Who shall also act as chief clerk.

If the gentleman from Iowa or others desire briefly to discuss the point of order, the Chair will hear them; if not, the Chair will rule.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to add to what I said on the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the observation I made the other day, I merely wish to say that, of course, it is not only necessary to retrench expenditures, but I recognize that the amendment must also be within the authority of the committee to legislate upon. I know of no law that creates this position of chief clerk connected with the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury Department other than appropriation law, and I know of no committee that would have jurisdiction of the elimination of this office or of providing for it other than the Committee on Appropriations. I take it that the Committee on Appropriations has authority to legislate, so far as this office of chief clerk is concerned, because it is purely, so far as I am advised, an office created by an appropriation law. If the committee has authority to make this recommendation in the purview of the rules of the House, then, of course, it comes within the provisions of the Holman rule, retrenching expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. While as a general proposition, under the rules of the House, it is not in order to legislate on general appropriation bills, yet there are exceptions making it in order to legislate, and under clause 2 of Rule XXI, commonly known as the Holman rule, it is in order by germane amendments which would retrench expenditures of the Government by the reduction of the number and salaries of the officers of the United States.

Now, it will generally be accepted, I apprehend, that a presiding court takes judicial cognizance of any statute law. The Chair thinks that the presiding officer of this House is authorized, in passing on points of order, to take judicial cognizance of any statute law. The Chair is aware that under the current law in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury there is a chief clerk, receiving a salary of $2,000. The language to which the point of order is made, the Chair thinks, clearly does away with the office of chief clerk, thereby reducing by one the number of salaries paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and places those duties upon the Solicitor of the Treasury. For these reasons the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out in line 17, page 119, the words "who shall also act as chief clerk," and inserting, after the figures "$3,000," on line 18, the following: "chief clerk, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 119, in line 17, strike out the words "who shall also act as chief clerk," and, in line 18, after the figures "$3,000," insert "chief clerk, $2,000."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be considerable mystery surrounding the action of the committee regarding this item. At the time it was under consideration in the committee I reserved the right to bring this amendment on the floor of the House.

I do not know why we have dropped the chief clerk of this great office. If, however, gentlemen will compare this provision with the existing law and then will take the statement that was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], we may find some reason why in this office, where there were 15 clerks and where we have dropped two, the committee has taken this action. It must have had some knowledge that the Borland amendment, requiring the clerks to work eight hours, was to be offered to the bill, because it reduces the number a little more than 8 per cent; and that is the only reason why, I apprehend, it will be seriously argued that we drop the chief clerk of this great division. There might be some reason for dropping the law clerk. There is no real reason for dropping the chief clerk.

The facts are these: A bright young man was employed as one of the law clerks in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury. He was so bright, indeed, that he began the practice of writing dissenting opinions when the Solicitor of the Treasury or his assistant was asked to write opinions and did write opinions on many important legal questions. He would attach a dissenting opinion to that of the solicitor—a practice that ought not to be permitted in any department of the Government.

Now, I do not know personally the gentleman who holds the office of Solicitor of the Treasury. I understand he is a good lawyer, and he is entitled to have men under him who will respect his office. I suppose this young man found that he was about to lose his job, and so he wrote a letter resigning, and in that letter claimed that there was no work for him to perform. On statements contained in that letter we dropped that office, and I am not complaining about that; but without a word of testimony we dropped also the office of chief clerk, and I submit to the committee that there is no rhyme or reason in our action. Think a minute about this great department of the Solicitor of the Treasury. At present there are only 15 men in this office, including the solicitor himself, but that office has a great deal of business to perform. I get the following facts from the report of the Solicitor of the Treasury. During the past year there were instituted against defaulting Government officials other than post-office officials nine civil suits aggregating $36,000, and there was collected $30,825.08 from such Government officials. There were instituted suits against postmasters claims aggregating $22,000, and there was collected $16,907.54.

There were criminal cases numbering 684 commenced by this department of the Government to collect fines aggregating $384,000, and the actual collections amounted to $92,913.21. There were 1,654 civil suits commenced by this department of the Government on claims aggregating more than $5,000,000, and there were collected through this department of the Government during the last fiscal year from all these sources $1,126,796.71.

It is a great office, an office where the Solicitor of the Treasury must have men of ability to perform the work. He uses trained lawyers. In that office we have one of the best law libraries in any department of the Government, containing between 8,000 and 10,000 volumes. And now we reduce his force from 15 men to 13 men, and take away from him his chief clerk and cripple him, and what is the reason? What is the explanation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was rather surprised at the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that there was some mystery connected with the action of the committee with reference to this particular bureau. I am sure the gentleman remembers that this matter was very thoroughly considered in the committee. Many facts were presented to the committee, and the action was taken as a result of the facts so presented.

This only furnishes another illustration that when the attention of Congress is called to the fact that a particular position in the Government is not needed, it is almost an impossibility to eliminate that position in the interest of the taxpayers of this country. I do not know the gentlemen who are connected with this bureau, and I have no reflections to make upon any of them. I dare say they are all exceedingly competent and efficient employees, but I do say from the evidence presented to this committee that the bureau of the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, in my judgment, is undoubtedly supplied with many more employees than are necessary to perform its duties. For my part, I believe that this committee could have easily recommended the dropping of at least one other clerk—the docket clerk—without any injury to the work in that bureau.

Now, what are the facts? The gentleman says that certain facts were presented to the committee by some one who probably feared that he might lose his job and therefore resigned, and the intimation was that this gentleman was influenced by that fact in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee.

When facts are presented to the committee showing that a particular position is unnecessary, there is nothing else that the Appropriations Committee can and should do except to report to this House and recommend in the interest of the Treasury that that position be eliminated.

A great many facts were presented in writing to the committee by this gentleman to whom the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] alludes. The gentleman from Iowa said he was probably in danger of losing his position. In justice to him I want to call the attention of the House to a letter which he wrote to the Attorney General as far back as September 23, 1914. The letter is as follows:

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.

SIR: I notice in a letter from the Acting Solicitor of the Treasury to you, dated the 21st instant, a recommendation that my salary as law clerk in this office be increased from $2,000 to $2,500 per annum. This recommendation was made without my knowledge or concurrence. The place I hold should be abolished. The work assigned to my desk during the last nine months has not been sufficient to keep a man of very moderate abilities employed more than one-third of his time.

Respectfully,

CHAPMAN W. MAUPIN.

In response to that letter the Attorney General very properly wrote him, thanking him for his letter, and stated:

The estimates I handed in to the Secretary of the Treasury did not include the increase referred to, but left the salary at $2,000. In view of your letter I can only ask for your resignation, to take effect the 1st of November. I appreciate the unusually fine spirit and self-denying patriotism which is indicated by your letter, and I think it very possible that this department may in the future utilize your services in other work.

Now, what happened? The gentleman sent in his resignation as law clerk at $2,000. It was accepted and became effective on November 1, 1914. That position was not filled. No effort was made to fill it until July, 1915, a period of eight months. More than that, the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury was itself vacant from December, 1913, until March, 1915, a period of 15 or 16 months. There we had this bureau to which the gentleman from Iowa alludes without this law clerk for 8 months, without a Solicitor of the Treasury for 15 or 16 months, and yet there is nothing in this record to show that the work was not current and was not carried on with the utmost dispatch, promptness, and efficiency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This office has carried for 10 years an appropriation of more than $28,000. In the meantime we have seen the work of that office diminished by taking away from it the customs classification, which is now with the Board of General Appraisers. We have seen taken away from it the Bureau of Immigration, which, as you know, does require considerable legal work. We have seen taken away from it the Bureau of Navigation, the Bureau of Lighthouses, and the Bureau of Steamboat-Inspection Service, all of which have been transferred to the Department of Commerce.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOOD. Of course the gentleman understands that I have not offered an amendment to restore the office of law clerk.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand. I am coming to the amendment of the gentleman. Now, during all this time, notwithstanding the fact that the work of this office has necessarily been largely decreased, there has been no estimate submitted to Congress or to the committee asking for a reduction of any of its employees.

Notwithstanding the fact that the office of Solicitor of the Navy only requires an appropriation of something over $16,000, the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce something less than $20,000, as I remember, and the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor only $12,000 or $13,000, the estimates for the office of Solicitor of the Treasury have contained no recommendation for a reduction. There is no bureau in this Government, so far as I know, where there are only six or eight clerks which has a chief clerk, whose duty, as you know, is simply to supervise the work being performed by the clerks in his bureau. It was the opinion of the committee that under the circumstances this office of chief clerk was absolutely unnecessary.

Now, this action was not taken without notice to the bureau. The Solicitor of the Treasury was asked to come before the committee and explain the necessity of these positions. What does he say? He said, when asked by me:

Mr. BYRNS. Exactly what services does the chief clerk perform?

Mr. BECKER. Well, the chief clerk is the executive officer of the office; he looks after the office generally; he keeps it going with supplies and assignments, and he is the checking clerk. All correspondence and opinions that go out are checked, and the chief clerk is one of the men who does the checking.

Mr. BYRNS. What do you mean by checking?

Mr. BECKER. He reads them over.

Mr. BYRNS. Does anybody else have anything to do with the checking of correspondence besides the chief clerk?

Mr. BECKER. Yes, sir; the assistant solicitor checks it also.

I submit to you, gentlemen, that under the showing made by the Solicitor of the Treasury himself there is absolutely no necessity in the bureau for a chief clerk, bearing in mind that there are only six clerks of the various classes in the bureau. What about the opinions rendered by this bureau? Mr. Maupin stated that in a period of 10 years there were only 973 opinions that were delivered or furnished by the bureau of the Solicitor of the Treasury. Most of them, as he says, are inconsequential in importance, most of them mere routine matters that needed no research. The solicitor himself made this statement, which I desire to read. He was asked by me in regard to this matter in connection with something that had gone before:

Mr. BYRNS. Not nearly so difficult, because an examiner of an abstract has to be very careful to look at every item and every entry. You say that they prepare opinions. Can you state about how many opinions are prepared in your office during the year?

Mr. BECKER. I am not able to answer that question off hand. The mere straight written opinions that go to the Secretary and the Comptroller of the Currency I would judge there were 200 or 300 of them that go out of the office in a year. There are also many verbal opinions given by the office.

Now, take his statement that there are 200 opinions in a year, or 300 named by him as a maximum, and here is the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Assistant Solicitor, and four law clerks, employed down there in preparing these opinions, many of which, as you know, do not require any particular research, and your Committee on Appropriations in making a recommendation was acting in the interest of the taxpayers of the country, feeling that it was the committee's duty, when facts were presented to it, as they were, to recommend to this House that the money in the Treasury be saved to the extent of this particular office, and one of the law clerks since it did not appear that they are necessary in performing any important duties whatever.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I nearly always find myself in harmony with this committee, and I am in sympathy with any proposition they submit that will bring about a decrease in our national expenditures. I do not think the destruction of this office, however, and the elimination of this position in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, will have that result or even tend in that direction.

There is no chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Commerce in the paragraph which immediately follows. There is no chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor in the paragraph that follows that, but there has been a chief clerk in this bureau for 46 years, and he is a most necessary official. The office of the Solicitor of the Treasury is older than that of the Department of Justice. This office was established as far back as 1820, while the Department of Justice was established in 1870. When the Department of Justice was created this office was attached to it.

Now, these other solicitors have only imposed upon them the business of preparing opinions and looking after the business of their particular departments. It is different with the position of the Solicitor of the Treasury. I understand that this office has charge of all suits brought by the various departments of the Government for the recovery of money, and the correspondence of this particular office is probably as large as the correspondence of the Department of Justice itself. They probably institute and look after as many cases in a year as the Department of Justice does in the same period of time, in all its official ramifications. We were told by the committee that a law clerk has been dispensed with here, because the clerk who held that particular office said he did not have enough work to do, but because a law clerk has been abolished, it is no reason why the position of chief clerk should be abolished.

The letter read from the law clerk who resigned his position, or whose resignation was requested because he said that he did not have enough work to do, does not challenge this particular office in the least. That letter is not printed in the hearings. In other words, the position of the committee is this—that on account of the statement of a law clerk that he did not get enough work to do, which statement does not appear in the hearings and is not accessible to any of us, they destroy the office of chief clerk as well as the office of the law clerk.

I find nothing in the testimony of the solicitor in the hearings which indicates in the least that this office is unnecessary or ought to be abolished. He discusses and refers to the period when there was no solicitor, and calls attention to the fact that during that period of time when there was no solicitor and when there was one law clerk less than the full number allowed by law, the departments sent business to the Department of Justice and other places that ought to have been disposed of here.

I want to refer now to some of the work performed in the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury. In 1913, under the direction of this office, 1,505 suits were commenced, and the amount sued for was nearly $8,000,000. All of this was superintended by this particular office. The amount of judgments obtained during 1913 was nearly $600,000. During that period of time there was collected upon judgments that had been recovered that year and in previous years $818,000; from unclaimed court funds, $34,000; from unclaimed seamen's funds, $8,000; and they compromised without suits proceedings upon which they collected $753,000, and also collected $738,000 in fines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. That is about the way the business has been running for years and years in that office. In 1911 the number of letters received here was 17,500, and there were 16,000 letters sent out. There were bonds and contracts examined in that year to the number of 4,739, and 207 written opinions were rendered. From that time on the business of the office has increased so enormously that they do not undertake to tabulate the letters, but the letters tabulated in prior years show that every day this office sends out in instructions to district attorneys throughout the United States, to claimants, and persons who are interested in the public business beween three and four hundred letters.

I will undertake to say that the Department of Justice itself does not send out that many in any one day, and all these letters pass over the desk of this chief clerk and are all checked by him before they are signed. Letters to which these are replies all pass over his desk and are apportioned by him among these various clerks. These contracts and bonds, amounting every year to nearly 5,000, in some years even more than that, are all examined and checked over by this chief clerk. The bond of the disbursing officer of this House before it is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury must bear the check of the gentleman who acts as chief clerk, and I understand the gentleman who has been filling that position is particularly efficient. He has been there ever since the old Cleveland days and was appointed by President Cleveland himself. In the last two years this office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the chief clerk is the administrative executive officer of the office, has collected out of fines and judgments that were considered absolutely worthless by the district attorneys where they were recovered between fifty and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that all of those lawsuits are put into the hands of the United States district attorneys over the country and are attended to by these district attorneys, and that, as a matter of fact, the office here has nothing to do with them except to refer them to the district attorneys and receive reports from time to time as to what is being done in the case?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and more than that, they continued writing to these attorneys from time to time, insisting on their collecting the judgments, and stating that their information is this and that, and so on, until, in spite of the reports of these district attorneys, this office has succeeded in bringing about the collection in the last two years of $50,000 of these fines reported as uncollectible and absolutely worthless. There is no set of officials in the Government worked as hard as these particular officials. If you impose upon the assistant solicitor the duties now discharged by the chief clerk, he will have less time to attend to the preparation of these numerous opinions on contracts and bonds and upon other matters which run up into the hundreds and hundreds every year. I am absolutely unable to agree with the position taken by the committee. To abolish this particular office means that we hinder and delay the work of district attorneys all over the United States, and that we hinder and delay the work of the Department of Justice itself.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I just want to present a few facts about this reduction. The material reduction in this office amounts to $4,000 by the elimination of two clerks. One of them happens to be the chief clerk. There have been some words said of an insinuating character that would lead the committee to believe that the statements made by Mr. Maupin should not be given very much weight because of the fact that Mr. Maupin resigned from the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury Department. I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee that I know Mr. Maupin personally; I know his family, and there is not a man of more integrity or a man of higher character ever in the service of the Government than Mr. Maupin. His brother lives in my town, in the city of Atlanta, and is the treasurer of the Southern Bell Telephone Co.—of that entire system in the South—and anything that Mr. Maupin says about a condition that exists in any office I take it as absolutely true and can be relied upon implicitly. I admit that it is quite an innovation for some gentlemen to lose two positions that pay a couple of thousand dollars each a year when there is no reason for them to exist. A good many gentlemen on the floor of this House know something about legal procedure and business. This is a form office down there. The cases they have are referred to the district attorneys throughout the country, and the letters that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] speaks of are form letters; and we are about to separate two men from two fat jobs that do not do as much work in a year in this office as the ordinary farmer in Georgia does in a week. Of course, there is a great howl about it, because these two gentlemen have to come from somebody's district and from somebody's State.

But, of course, it is all right for poor old Uncle Sam; just stick them off on him, whether he needs them or wants them. Do not remove one of these solicitors or chief clerks that do not do anything; let us perpetuate them in office at the expense of the taxpayer. Now, the truth is they have got men down there who are just in one another's way. [Laughter.] That is the Lord's truth about it. [Laughter.] After you take these two men out of the solicitor's office you have 13 men left down there at large salaries, and the ordinary lawyer who has got any practice at home does as much work in 24 hours as they do in a month, and you want to saddle them on the people at $2,000 a year. Now, let us see. Mr. BYRNS said this to a man by the name of Mawhinney:

Mr. BYRNS. You have two clerks of class 4. Just what do they do?
Mr. MAWHINNEY. Two of those are docket clerks.
Mr. BYRNS. They keep the dockets?
Mr. MAWHINNEY. They are really keeping the dockets.
Mr. BYRNS. Does it take two clerks to keep the dockets? It is just a notation of the style of the case and then when some action is taken in the case you note it on the docket?
Mr. BECKER. That is true.

Now, that is a whale of a job for a grown man to get $2,000 a year [laughter], and I am absolutely astounded——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Leave us astounded.

Mr. HOWARD. I will leave the astonishment to you, gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, at the very beginning I want to announce that I am not seeking to antagonize the Committee on Appropriations; I have had all of that I want. We are sitting here to-day in the capacity of a jury to pass upon a controversy, and there are two witnesses before us whose testimony must be taken into consideration; two witnesses who by reason of association and status in the House are presumed to be equally credible; two witnesses each of whom has equal information as to the matters of which they speak. The one whom I shall refer to first is the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee, who, with fervid and fiery eloquence, does credit to the State from which he comes, has almost intoxicated this House to a point where reason can not assert itself. He says the committee gave this matter ponderous consideration. Oh, how they labored over this particular question, according to his testimony. He read from some old document, so far as I know printed in 1815, or possibly later, by the way of argument to sustain his contention.

Then comes the next witness, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who has had equal opportunity to inform himself and who has been associated with the other witness and, hence, is entitled to equal credit with him, and he tells you seriously that the action of the committee in striking out the clerk, about which complaint is made, is without "rhyme or reason"; in other words, it is outrageous. Now, I am very much inclined to agree with the gentleman from Iowa, and the only reason I withhold full assent is because he limits his characterization of the action of the committee to one instance instead of making it apply to the provisions relating to the Bureau of Pensions also. [Laughter.] If the gentleman had made his charge a little broader, I would have given unconditional assent to his conclusion and fully agreed with him that there is no "rhyme or reason" in the conduct of this committee in its treatment of that bureau. But, as I have said, I do not want any further controversy with the committee; I have been laid low and walked over by the stalwart forms of these gentlemen from Iowa, Mississippi, Tennessee, and the Lord knows who else. [Laughter.] All this in reference to a clerk. Do we need that clerk? Why, the gentleman from Iowa says, "Yes; we need him," and the gentleman from Tennessee says, "No"; that we can spare not only this clerk, but we can dispense with others, too.

Mr. GOOD. I did not say we needed the clerk, but I said we needed the chief clerk.

Mr. RUCKER. That particular clerk. Wait until I get through and you will have another question to ask me. There seems to be some inconsistency here, because this same committee, as the gentleman knows, without "rhyme or reason" the other day struck out a chief clerk of one of the divisions in the Pension Bureau, and when I offered on the floor an amendment to restore him the gentleman from Iowa voted against it, if I am right——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I think he did, and perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee, too. I think the gentleman from Iowa voted against restoring the place of chief of the division. Possibly an error was made, possibly the committee acted without consideration, possibly it is true that—

Judgment, thou hast fled to brutish beasts and men have lost their reason.

[Applause.]

There is no "rhyme or reason," the gentleman asserts, in the action of the committee in this case. The charge could be enlarged. The gentleman sustained the action of the committee. The action of the Appropriations Committee must be sustained, he contended. Now, the gentleman says the committee did not consider this matter, and the gentleman from Tennessee says it was carefully considered, and durned if I believe—I will not argue with either gentleman—but I believe I will vote with the gentleman from Iowa, not because I love him most, because I have no excess of love for either one of these distinguished gentlemen. [Laughter.] Before either of you can have my unqualified, heartfelt affection you must be born again and thrilled with a spirit and desire to do right by these old men in the Pension Office, many of whom had to go on the highways last year and 25 or 30 of whom will strike the road again July 1 of this year. You may talk all you please about it, but you should not turn these old soldiers out on the highways. I tell you there is neither "rhyme nor reason" in the conduct of this committee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think Members can very easily understand the position of the committee regarding their action in eliminating the chief clerk. It was very quickly made apparent to me from the statement of the gentleman who has charge of the bill, when he stated that there was no chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor for the Department of Commerce; neither was there any chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor. It would be an easy inference that, if a chief clerk was not needed in those offices, it would not be needed in this. I think that, Mr. Chairman, is an explanation of the action of the committee in recommending that this chief clerk should be abolished.

However, there is a great difference in the importance and amount of work done in these offices. The office of chief clerk in this bureau was specifically established by law when the bureau was created in 1870. Particular duties are imposed on him by law. He is the permanent executive officer of the bureau, and in many ways the most important officer of the bureau. All Members of the House understand that the property of the United States of America, the real property, the post offices and all the other public buildings, are under the charge of the Treasury Department. All the bonds that are issued by all the officers, practically, in the United States Government must be passed on in the Solicitor's office of the Treasury Department. The law says this with regard to the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, that it is his duty to superintend all orders, suits, or proceedings in law or equity for the recovery of money, chattels, tenements, or hereditaments in the name and for the use of the United States.

Every year, Mr. Chairman, more than 5,000 suits are brought by this department of the Government. Every year more than 5,000 suits are brought under the direction and by the initiative of the Solicitor of the Treasury. It may properly be said that, so far as the property interests of the Government are concerned, this is the most important bureau of the Government. Suits on bond forfeitures, to collect fines and forfeitures, and many others of like character must be brought by the Solicitor of the Treasury Department. It is in a great many respects second only to the Attorney General's office of the United States with regard to legal proceedings on the part of the Government. Nine-tenths of all of the suits brought by the United States are brought by the Solicitor of the Treasury; even, I think, a larger proportion than that. And so gentlemen can very easily see that there should be a difference and distinction made between the solicitor's office in this department, which has all of these great duties intrusted to it, and the solicitor's office in these other departments that have none of these duties intrusted to them.

In other words, this is the great bureau of the Government that looks after the property interests of the United States of America. And yet the chief clerk, the one man about whom really the effective work of the office centers is abolished by the committee in its recommendations. I am satisfied that is a mistake. The present chief clerk has been there for more than 20 years. He is the one directing officer that is permanent, the officer that does not change with each administration. As administrations change, new solicitors and assistant solicitors are appointed, but the chief clerk remains there, a trained and skilled lawyer, always at the head of this department. As the evidence read by the chairman of the committee shows, the solicitor himself stated that the chief clerk is the chief executive officer of this great bureau.

My good friend from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] ridicules and belittles docket keeping. He says that is purely an administrative function. I want to say to the gentleman that he does not know what docket keeping is if that is the view he takes of it. Docket keeping means always keeping the record of the bringing of suits, when and where brought, the issues and the nature of the action, with the amount in controversy; and every subsequent step in the progress of that case is detailed and set forth in that docket entry—the overruling of a demurrer, the securing of a judgment, and the nature of that judgment, the issuance of executions, and the steps taken to collect the judgments.

Why, Mr. Chairman, hundreds of thousands of dollars are collected every year through this department of the Government which these gentlemen, mistakenly, I think, are now seeking to very seriously cripple.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, it is very seldom that I do not follow the Appropriations Committee of this House. In this case I feel very sure that a mistake is made in undertaking to dismiss from the service the chief clerk in the solicitor's department. The Department of Justice, in the first instance, recommends that the present force be continued. The Appropriations Committee had before it, according to the hearings, the Solicitor of the Treasury, and he says that they need the present force.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, according to the hearings, had this colloquy with the Solicitor of the Treasury:

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For a number of years there has been appropriated for your office the sum of $28,980, and you are asking for the same appropriation for the next fiscal year. You have under that appropriation, in addition to the assistant solicitor, a chief clerk, two law clerks, two docket clerks, 2 clerks of class 4, 2 clerks of class 3, 2 clerks of class 2, an assistant messenger, and a laborer. I want to ask you whether it would not be possible to get along with a less number of clerks, law clerks in particular?

Mr. BECKER. As to the law clerks, in my opinion, we need all that we have now. The work has been increased materially in the last 10 months.

This would show, if nothing else, that if the appropriations heretofore made were proper appropriations, then this ought to be continued as it is in the current year, because there is more work to do than was done last year.

Now, I want to call attention to one statement that was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. He made light of the work of the docket clerks, and said there were two docket clerks, and all they did was to keep the dockets. The strange feature of it is that both docket clerks are retained, and if this bill were to become a law both the docket clerks will be on the roll after the 1st day of July. There is nothing here to show that the chief clerk is not an important factor, and not one word to indicate that the chief clerk ought not to be retained in his office.

Now, what is the animus back of this? I do not mean the animus of the committee. The committees of this House act honestly and try to do their duty. This committee has tried to do its duty, and I am not reflecting for a moment on any member of it.

Mr. Becker, the solicitor, said:

Yes, sir. The Attorney General called my attention to the vacancy and the letter that he had from the party who formerly held the position. He recommended that the office ought to be abolished, as he was going to resign. But on investigation it was found that there was bad blood in the office between him and Col. Reeve, the assistant solicitor, who was formerly the solicitor and who has been in the office ever since Cleveland's last term or, probably, his first term. But there was bad blood between those two gentlemen. Mr. Maupin would go to the extent of writing a dissenting opinion against Solicitor Reeve, send it to the Secretary, and put it on file. He was clearly guilty of the worst kind of insubordination, and you could not keep order in an office and accomplish anything with that kind of a system and that kind of discipline. He intended to go out into private practice, and I have come to the conclusion that this was the last kick. I am a stranger to their whole quarrel, but I understand these are the facts.

Now, on the testimony of this man who performed that kind of work, you undertake to dismiss from the service, not Mr. Reeve, but the chief clerk, who is responsible for the work of that office, and who does more work in that office than any other person in it. He has been there for 25 years. What is the experience of any of you when you go into a department? You go to the head of the department, but whom do you see when you wish to secure any valuable information? The chief clerk, in almost any department of the Government; and it is a chief clerk that they are seeking now to dismiss from the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on the amendment, if no gentleman desires further to discuss it. The Clerk will report it before it is voted on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: Amend, page 119, line 17, after the word "solicitor," by striking out the words "who shall also act as chief clerk," and after the figures "$3,000" insert "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. While the committee allows 40 minutes' debate, if no one desires to discuss the amendment the vote will be had.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understood that three gentlemen on that side wanted to make some remarks. Evidently they are expecting now that I shall take the floor, so that there can be three or four speeches in opposition to the amendment. I hope that if the gentlemen wish to address the committee on the subject they will use the time now. I desire to address the House just before the gentlemen of the committee vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I thought that inasmuch as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] is in favor of the amendment he would take the floor, and I would follow in opposition, and then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SIS-

SON] would follow and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] would close.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not concerned as to the order in which the gentlemen shall speak.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time of the House beyond three or four minutes. Those of you who have followed my course during my term as a Member of this House know that I have always stood with the committees in their efforts to reduce expenditures. I have always stood for economy in this House, and I should like this morning to follow this committee, but I can not do it, Mr. Chairman. I believe they have made a mistake—not an intentional one—the gentlemen upon this committee have a great deal of work to do; they are called upon to make appropriations for a great Government and for many departments of that Government, and it is absolutely impossible for them to go into an office and examine in minute detail everything connected with that office.

I am frank to say that I believe the chairman of this subcommittee or any member of it, if he had gone to that office and had examined carefully the work of the chief clerk of that office, and had seen what he does from day to day and from week to week, and what he has accomplished in that office during the years he has filled it so efficiently and so well, he would not be here this morning asking that the office be abolished. [Applause.]

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, this is one occasion when I think the subcommittee has recommended a reduction that ought not to be made. I have examined in detail the hearings before the committee. I have made investigations into the office itself to see what is done by the man whose office you are seeking this morning to abolish. I say to you frankly that there is not a man in that office who does the character of work that is done now by the gentleman who occupies the position of chief clerk, and this Committee of the Whole will make a mistake if it follows the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations on this occasion and abolishes this office.

I hope you will take this matter into careful consideration, and will not, as is usual, come in here without knowing anything about this question and follow the committee, but that you will follow those of us who have made careful investigation of this particular matter and who say to you that the committee is wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee, if it ever gave careful consideration to the elimination of an official, certainly did so in this particular, for, as the hearings show, the committee devoted eight pages of direct testimony to the work of this office. The solicitor virtually apologized for having so many men in his employ as were provided for in the last appropriation bill. They have 11 clerks, and the lowest-priced clerk, gentlemen, is at $1,400. There are two clerks at $2,000, two at $1,800, two at $1,600, and two at $1,400. The solicitor's position was vacant for more than eight months. The assistant solicitor's office was vacant for nearly the same length of time. The number of opinions prepared in this office is from 200 to 300. Each of those high-priced clerks in that office is a law clerk, performing work similar to that which is done by the chief clerk.

Here we have a solicitor's office in the Department of Labor and a solicitor's office in the Department of Commerce without a chief clerk. Everyone who understands these matters knows that a chief clerk is merely useful for the distribution of mail and work of a supervisory character, so far as the work of the office is concerned. In this office we have a solicitor and an assistant solicitor. It is admitted that there is no need of this chief clerk. There are some bureaus where the work is behind, but not so in this case. The only thing to do under the circumstances was to combine the functions of the chief clerk with those of the assistant solicitor.

The proponents, who are striving to retain this chief clerk, would make you believe that that office has charge of all the litigation in the country. As a matter of fact, they only receive contracts and investigate to ascertain whether or not there is a violation of their terms and file opinions thereon, two or three hundred of them in a year.

You are asked to go contrary to the unanimous action of the subcommittee, with the exception of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], supported now by the combined vote of the Representatives from the State of Missouri, for personal reasons, which are entirely justified from their standpoint. I ask you, gentlemen, whether there is any item in the bill where the committee that prepared this bill has forfeited your confidence in recommending the elimination of needless employees?

This does not mean the elimination of this needless employee, for whom these gentlemen are fighting, but merely a reduction of salary to that of a lower grade. It is admitted that there is no need whatsoever of a chief clerk in this office. There is no chief clerk in the office of the Solicitor for the Department of Commerce or in the Department of Labor. The hearings show that the solicitor almost apologized for the slight amount of work that the office had to do, and they also show that one man resigned from his office because there was no work for him to do.

On that showing, with one man resigning from the office because there was no work, resigning without any pique or spleen against anyone, how can you under those circumstances go contrary to the action of the committee, when they, after considering the administration of this office in connection with the administration of all the other offices, sought to do what was proper from a business standpoint? We leave it to you to determine whether the committee is right, or whether these persons who are not acquainted with the work of the office should have their opinion approved.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am really amazed at some of the statements that have been made regarding this office. The chief clerk in this office is a civil-service employee. He has been in that office for a number of years, and I want to suggest this to the good sense of this committee: If that office could go along for two years without a commissioner, as stated, and a year and a half without an assistant commissioner, an office that collects more than $1,000,000 a year for the Government, with only 13 men in that office, and with a chief clerk as the presiding officer, that office must have had a good man as chief clerk. [Applause.] I am not willing to leave him out in the cold now. Gentlemen say it is admitted that they do not need this office. Nowhere in the hearings is there such an admission. The gentleman from Wisconsin says the commissioner says he has clerks enough. On the contrary, the commissioner said that because of the fact that there was not a commissioner or assistant commissioner, because of the fact that the solicitor's office had not been filled, many departments had been going to some of the other law officers of the Government for their legal opinions. One opinion a day comes from this office, some requiring more than three weeks of a single man's time to write; 40 letters a day received, and over $1,126,000 of collections of fines a year is some of the work done by this office. Now it is proposed to drop the chief clerk. I defy the gentleman who will follow me to point to a letter or a word in these hearings where anybody recommended the abolition of the office of chief clerk.

I repeat, when a sorehead in a department will do as one of the law clerks did down in the solicitor's, and write dissenting opinions in opposition to the opinions of his chief, and send them to the various departments of this Government, when we find that state of facts we can well conclude what sort of a man he is, and that is the kind of fellow we are following. If I had been commissioner or assistant commissioner and a law clerk had been doing that kind of thing, I would have discharged him. It is on his letter, and his letter alone—a letter so filled with prejudice that the gentlemen who had charge of the hearings, notwithstanding the fact that the letter was read before the subcommittee, were refrained from putting it in the hearings—that is the testimony on which the committee acted—and not on the recommendation of an official.

We have given this department two less officials than were estimated for. In my humble judgment we have not given it the clerks that are necessary, and I for one propose to stand here and vote against this proposition to remove a man who has been giving such good service, who is a civil-service employee, to make room for some one else.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] quoted a part of the testimony with regard to these law clerks. I wanted him to quote the rest; but to show how fairly they would wage the fight against this amendment, the gentleman stopped just where I asked a question with regard to what these docket clerks did where they are designated as docket clerks. I said:

The designation is a misnomer.

Mr. Becker, the commissioner, said:

Yes; they are really two important men, who do nothing but write opinions, but they are designated as docket clerks.

And yet they say we can get along without these men. If the commissioner had estimated for the abolishing the office of the chief clerk, and the hearings justified such a recommendation, I would have voted for it. Why, in making appropriations in this House, as a rule, we never make appropriations unless there is an estimate, and we give careful consideration to the estimates of those men who know what they are estimating for. Here was an estimate made for a chief clerk, and if there is a department in this Government to which we ought to give all the help it needs and all the lawyers that are required to collect the fines from criminals, it is this office where every suit starts for the collection of a fine. There were 1,600 suits last year of a civil nature and $1,126,000 collected for the Government of the United States, and now we are asked to cripple this arm of the Government. I am not willing to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, before beginning my remarks I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the letter from Mr. Maupin in reference to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: It seems proper that, in entering upon the duties of the office to which you have been recently appointed, your attention should be called to certain conditions which exist therein:

1. On account of a decline in the business of the office, due, perhaps, to the transfer of certain classes of business from the Treasury to other departments, there are several more men in the office than are needed for the efficient transaction of that part of its business not attended to by its clerical force, namely, the preparation of written and the delivery of oral opinion on questions arising in the Treasury Department. There are four men usually engaged in this work—the Solicitor, the Assistant Solicitor, and the two law clerks. I believe that I am correct in stating that all matters coming before the office in any shape do not require the use of one-half of the time of either of the two first-named officers. The greater part of the time employed by the four officers mentioned is employed in the preparation of written opinions on questions of law submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistants and by other officers of the department. Occasionally there are conferences between them and the officers named, in which verbal opinions are given or advice furnished; but such conferences are infrequent, averaging perhaps not as many as one a week, and the time employed in them is inconsequential. Advice is sometimes orally given to heads of bureaus and divisions who come to the office, but it is usually upon matters requiring little or no consideration or upon questions thoroughly settled by prior rulings of the office or of the Attorney General. If a question of any novelty or difficulty is presented, the proponent is invariably asked to submit it in writing, in order that it may be studied and made the subject of a written opinion.

Not one-half of the time of one of the law clerks—the writer—is required, or has been required, for attention to and transaction of the business assigned to his desk. At times seasons of stress have occurred in his experience, such, for example, as those when the Aldrich-Vreeland currency bill and the Glass currency bill and their various modifications were submitted to the office for review. But such occasions have been of very infrequent occurrence. A tabulation is hereto appended, from which it appears that of 973 written opinions furnished by the office during the period from January 2, 1900, to September 30, 1909, 534, or about 55 per cent of the whole, were prepared by the writer, they being of equal difficulty with the residue. During that period the duties of the writer consisted in the preparation of written opinions, the preparation of briefs on law questions for the use of the office and of United States attorneys in suits under the direction and control of the office, the drafting of legislation, and conducting the correspondence in cases assigned to his desk. A few of the 973 opinions were upon questions of considerable difficulty, but the greater part of them required little labor or research, and many of them do not deserve to be considered opinions at all, some of them appearing to have been classed as such for no better reason than the appearance of the words "I am of opinion" in them. Such of those prepared by the writer as were submitted to and signed or "checked" by the Assistant Solicitor were signed or "checked" by him, in nearly every instance, without comment or discussion of any kind. Most of those prepared by the writer which bear the signature of the Solicitor (O'Connell) were signed by him without discussion, but it is believed that he was, in every instance, familiar with the facts appearing in the papers submitted with the request for his opinion, it being his invariable habit to give such papers a careful examination and to discuss freely with his legal staff any matter of law arising upon the papers which did not seem perfectly clear.

The writer here states his belief that the performance of all duties assigned to him, including the preparation of the opinions mentioned, did not require more than one-half of his time, if that much, during the period in question. He does not hesitate to state further his belief that a single competent lawyer, familiar with questions of law arising in the department, could have prepared the whole of the 973 opinions, and have given all the oral advice furnished by the office during the period which they cover—10 years—without an undue tax upon his time and capacities. That would have required about one written opinion in every three days, without regard to the nature of the question, difficult or otherwise. Examination of these opinions, as they appear in the office files, will, it is confidently believed, bear out and justify the statements here made. In this connection, attention is called to the fact that the entire stenographic and type work required by the solicitor, assistant solicitor, the two law clerks, and part of that required by the chief clerk and "bond clerk," are not, and have not been, sufficient to occupy two-thirds of the time of the one employee having charge of the same.

If the beliefs of the writer, as expressed above, are well founded, one must be at a loss to understand why there should be a necessity for law clerks in the office. It may be noted here that the business of the office was transacted, until a comparatively recent period, without the assistance of such officers, and that, too, at a time when the business of the office was much greater than it is now, including, as it did, questions of customs classification since transferred to the Board of General Appraisers, and questions arising in the Bureaus of Immigration and Chinese Exclusion, of Steamboat Inspection, of the Lighthouse Inspection, and of Navigation, since transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor.

2. The office of chief clerk in this bureau is practically a sinecure, and should, when a vacancy occurs, be combined with that of assistant solicitor, as it is in the office of the Solicitor for the Department of Commerce. The principal duty of a chief clerk, under sections 173 and 174 of the Revised Statutes, consists in the supervision of the clerks and employees in the performance of their duties. Excluding the two law clerks and the two messengers there are only 8 persons performing their duties under the supervision of the chief clerk in this bureau. In no other bureau, it seems, in any of the departments, have the services of a chief clerk been deemed necessary for the supervision of so small a body of employees. In many of the bureaus in which there is a chief clerk it will be found that there are from 20 to 40 employees under his supervision. In many of the divisions having from 15 to 20 or more employees, there is no chief clerk. (See the last appropriation act, 37 Stats., 751, et seq.) The number of employees to be supervised, however, does not necessarily determine the question of the need of a chief clerk; the vital factor is the quantity and character of the business transacted by the office. Intelligent observation of the business coming in and going out of this office for a convenient period, will convince any competent and distinterested person that all the services actually performed by, or required of, a chief clerk in this bureau, could be performed either by the assistant solicitor or by some one of the clerks in the office, without interfering with the efficient and satisfactory discharge of the regular duties of the officer so called upon, or making necessary an increase in his salary. One of the principal duties of the chief clerk is the examination of the daily mail and the assignment of the same to the different desks in the office. I say, with confidence, that not more than an average of three or four of the letters received each day by the office, relate to matters not previously before the office, or require anything more than a glance in order to be properly assigned by the chief clerk. I say, further, that not more than an average of four or five of the letters received each day consist of anything more than a mere routine form, filled out and addressed by United States attorneys and others to the office, or require any examination by the chief clerk.

3. No attempt whatever is made in the office to ascertain whether the work assigned to the various clerks could be or ought to be dispatched by them more expeditiously than it is; in other words, to ascertain whether their time is fully employed. It is plain that sections 173 and 174 of the Revised Statutes intend that some method or system shall be devised whereby it can be determined whether the output of work by a particular clerk is what it should be or whether the amount of work going to his desk is sufficient to justify the salary he receives. Instead of the institution of any such method or sytsem the accepted theory of the office seems to be that nothing more is required by law than that each man's work shall be "up" at the end of the day, and that the Government is not concerned as to how that part of his time not required for the dispatch of work coming to his desk is employed. As a matter of fact, it has been a common occurrence in the past for certain of the clerks to ask and receive permission to leave the office for their homes at 3 o'clock, upon their statement that their work for the day was "up."

4. It is believed that so much of the annual report to the Attorney General as is prepared by the clerks in the office serves no good purpose whatever and should be discontinued. To say that 2,000 letters were written or 2,000 letters were received or 100 opinions were furnished or 500 compromises were made by the office during the fiscal year conveys not the slightest idea of the volume or importance of the business of the office during that time, because nothing appears as to the character or nature of the letters or of the opinions or of the suits or of the compromises in question. In some respects the report is misleading; for the amounts collected by the district attorneys, by suit or otherwise, are reported as collections by the office, from which a casual reader would infer that the office was largely instrumental in the collection, whereas in most cases it had not the least part in the collection, other than the mere transmission of the claim to the United States Attorney. In one instance the sum of $2,000,000, proceeds of compromise of a suit against one of the sugar companies, was included in the report as a collection by the office, while the facts were that the suit was directed by the collector of customs at New York without consulting this office, and the solicitor was directed by the Attorney General to recommend acceptance of the offer of compromise to the Secretary of the Treasury.

5. A question exists as to whether, under certain pertinent statutes, the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Solicitor of the Treasury, has the exclusive right of passing upon offers of compromise of civil suits brought by the United States, as against the asserted right and power of the Attorney General to direct the compromise of such suits by the district attorneys. A further question exists as to whether the Solicitor of the Treasury has the exclusive right to direct and supervise the district attorneys in all civil suits for the recovery of debts due to the United States, in view of the provision of the act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stats., 327), that nothing in the act of August 2, 1861 (12 Stats., 285), charging the Attorney General with the "general superintendence and direction" of district attorneys "as to the manner or discharging their duties," should be construed to repeal, modify, or in any way affect the laws regulating or defining the duties of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and whether the last act is superseded by section 350 of the Revised Statutes, providing that certain officers, including the Solicitor of the Treasury, shall exercise their functions under the supervision and control of the Department of Justice. It is submitted that the best solution of these questions would be a statutory reorganization of the solicitor's office, transferring all that part of its business relating to the direction and control of district attorneys and compromising of claims, together with the keeping of dockets of cases, to the Department of Justice proper, leaving to the solicitor the sole duty of acting as legal adviser to the Secretary of the Treasury; in other words, putting the solicitor upon the same plane as that occupied by the solicitors in the other departments. It is believed that the present system results in some duplication of work, and it certainly leads to misapprehension and confusion in the minds of district attorneys and other Federal officers who address communications to the Attorney General that should be addressed to this office.

It is also a bad business policy to build up in one department a large bureau with quarters in and rendering its services to another department, especially where the department in which the bureau is domiciled exercises no control or supervision over the employees in such bureau. Supervision not being exercised over the bureau by either department, there is a natural tendency to laxity of discipline among its employees. And the parent department, having no close relations with the bureau, naturally loses, or is thought to lose, interest in its employees, who therefore have not the stimulus for greater exertions that the hope or prospect of promotion to vacancies occurring in the parent department affords. It is related of one Attorney General that on a particular occasion he frankly admitted that he did not know that the Solicitor of the Treasury was an officer of his department.

There are two ways in which the trustworthiness of the views herein expressed as to the work of this office can be approximately tested: First, by examination and thorough consideration of all new business coming into the office during any given period in the future, following the items thereof to their respective desks and noting the time actually in the dispatch thereof, together with the time which would have been reasonably required therefor, having regard to the nature of each particular item, and the difficulty or want of difficulty in dispatching the same; second, by like examination and consideration of all business that came into the office during any given period in the past and of the dispatch of that business as shown by the files of the office. The business of the office can not be exactly gauged by either of these methods, but the results of either will be sufficient to satisfy competent and disinterested persons that ample grounds exist for the statement herein made as to the disproportion between the volume of that business and the number of men employed for its dispatch.

The writer is fully aware of the force of two propositions usually advanced in explanation or excuse of conditions such as those existing in this office, namely, that the value of the services of professional men can not be accurately measured by the length of time employed in their performance, and that in all law offices the tide of business ebbs and flows, there being times when the greatest demands are made upon the capacities of the employees and other times when there is comparatively little to do. Full allowance has been made for both of these considerations in reaching the conclusions herein stated. Just how much weight they are entitled to, so far as this office is concerned, can only be known by careful and intelligent observation of the daily routine of its business for a suitable period. When one reads the list of matters placed by statute under the cognizance of the Solicitor of the Treasury, the impression naturally resulting is that the volume of business thence arising must be sufficient to fully occupy the time of every person in the office. More unreliable data in that respect could not be found. Under one of these statutes—that which provides how the solicitor shall clear Government property from liens asserted against it—action has been taken but once in the last 15 years, and under another—that which provides for his issuing distress warrants against the persons and property of defaulting disbursing officers—action has been taken but twice in the same period. As suggested before, there is one and only one way in which the quantity of business coming before the office, the time taken for its dispatch, and the need for changes in the office force can be determined, and that is by the daily close observation of the workings of the office by competent and disinterested persons for a suitable period.

If the statutory reorganization of the office herein suggested should be deemed inadvisable or inexpedient, it is respectfully submitted that the office force should be reduced either by transfer to the department proper or by allowing vacancies to remain unfilled until there are no more men in the office than the business coming before it is sufficient to keep fully occupied at least three-fourths of their time.

Very respectfully,

CHAPMAN W. MAUPIN.

Mr. SISSON. Gentlemen, in the first place, I want to tell you that this office has had taken away from it within the last few years the following duties: First, the Customs Classifications Service; second, the Bureau of Immigration; third, the Bureau of Navigation; fourth, the Bureau of the Lighthouse Service; fifth, the Steamboat-Inspection Service; and the attorneys doing that work have been assigned to the departments where that work is done.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, how long since these duties were taken away?

Mr. SISSON. At different times.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they were taken away when the Department of Commerce was created, 10 years ago.

Mr. SISSON. The Customs Reclassification Service was not.

Mr. MANN. No; but all the rest of them were.

Mr. SISSON. And since that time the Bureau of Immigration, two years ago.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the Immigration Service has been in the Department of Commerce ever since it was created.

Mr. SISSON. Yes; but the writing of the legal opinions was not taken away until two years ago.

Mr. GOOD. And more duties have been given to that office since that time than were taken away.

Mr. SISSON. The only duties which have been placed upon him in the last few years have been in reference to the new Federal reserve banking system.

Mr. MADDEN. How about the income tax?

Mr. SISSON. In the Internal-Revenue Department there are a number of lawyers, and the opinions of the internal-revenue office are rendered there.

Now, the truth of the business is that these suits they speak of as originating in this office are originated in the offices of the various district attorneys, and those suits are reported here and dockets made in order that they may be kept up with.

Now, when the gentleman who held this position resigned he gave to this committee the facts in reference to the duties performed there, and your subcommittee then, without any controversy, and the full committee, without any controversy from either side politically—because this is purely a nonpartisan question—agreed as to what should be done. I do not know the politics of this gentleman, and I do not care, but I do know that from March, 1914, to June, 1915, this position was absolutely vacant, and there was no complaint of any kind about it. But it just happens that there is a vacancy there by law, and some gentleman wanted a job, and they have given it to him.

Mr. RUBEY. Does the gentleman refer to the chief clerk?

Mr. SISSON. I am speaking of the other position. This vacancy occurred and the duties of chief clerk were performed by another officer. They have 13 men in the office now.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Is there anything to show that the chief clerk was not at his post during the last 13 months?

Mr. SISSON. No; but prior to that time the office was vacant for several months without being filled. The chief clerk's office was there, but no one to fill it. Now, if you take the testimony, you will find that the opinions rendered in the department, nine-tenths of them, can be rendered right off the reel. Very few of them require much investigation. It is a very rare thing that a new question comes before that department which requires any degree of investigation, and for the reason that we felt that these vacancies were vacancies which ought to be filled we have consolidated with the assistant solicitor the office of chief clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee) there were 113 ayes and 38 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Solicitor of the Department of Labor: Solicitor, $5,000; law clerk, $2,000; clerks—two of class 4, two of class 1; messenger; in all, $13,840.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the committee on the splendid spirit of harmony that prevails this morning and the almost unanimity of action, and during this era of good feeling I want to call attention to the fact that on last Saturday while the committee had under consideration the paragraph on page 95 of the bill, a legislative provision which provided that in the Pension Bureau, notwithstanding the committee had made 68 reductions in the force, no clerk could be appointed or promoted in the office until there were four vacancies in the particular grade or class. I offered as an amendment the legislative provision that now exists in the law, one which forbids the department to put a clerk in the bureau until four vacancies occur in the bureau instead of four in the particular grade.

I rise now for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the committee return to page 95 and reconsider the action of the committee by which that amendment was voted down and vote on the amendment again. I believe that this committee would vote to-day to adopt my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to recur to page 95 and vote on an amendment which was offered and rejected some days ago.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that amendment was voted on and considered at great length the other day, and I am constrained to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For securing information for census reports, provided for by law, semimonthly reports of cotton production, periodical reports of stocks of baled cotton in the United States and of the domestic and foreign consumption of cotton; quarterly reports of tobacco; per diem compensation of special agents and expenses of same and of detailed employees, whether employed in Washington, D. C., or elsewhere; the cost of transcribing State, municipal, and other records, temporary rental of quarters outside of the District of Columbia; for supervising special agents, and employment by them of such temporary service as may be necessary in collecting the statistics required by law, including $15,000 for collecting tobacco statistics authorized by law in addition to any other fund available therefor: Provided, That hereafter there shall be in the official organization of the bureau a separate, distinct, and independent division called the Division of Cotton and Tobacco Statistics: Provided further, That the compensation of not to exceed five special agents provided for in this paragraph may be fixed at a rate not to exceed $8 per day, $512,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important items carried by this section is the appropriation of $15,000 for the collection of tobacco statistics. As is well known by the membership of this House, there is no product in this country that enters into the financial running machinery, so to speak, of this Government as does the item of tobacco. It is one of the greatest revenue producers, and it is essential that the Government should know the quantity of tobacco raised. It is essential and very beneficial to the farmer to know the exact quantity of tobacco that is raised, for the reason that it is a commodity the price of which is controlled almost exclusively by what is commonly known as the Tobacco Trust. The statistics that the Government collects and publishes are disseminated among the farmers, and it enables them to form an estimate and reach a conclusion as to the quantity of tobacco that is on the market, and enables them to determine whether the acreage for the ensuing year should be increased or diminished.

As one of the benefits that results from this law, it has been discovered that there has been in vogue a practice of not reporting tobacco alleged to be in storage tolerated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; not recently, but by a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The present commissioner I believe does not approve of some of those practices that have heretofore prevailed. There was, under the ruling of a former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, about 50,000,000 pounds of tobacco in the warehouses that escaped tabulation by the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The special agents that were authorized by the appropriation bill to be used by the Bureau of the Census discovered this discrepancy in the total amount of production.

Therefore I think that this is an appropriation that is well spent. The revenue collected by the Government runs into the millions of dollars. The amount of tobacco raised runs into the billions of pounds. Now, the section of the State of Kentucky from which I come is a large producer of the burley type of tobacco, and this appropriation of $15,000 is to carry into effect what is commonly known as the Cantrill Act, which has been very beneficial in that it has enabled the farmers to realize a higher price for their product. Prior to the passage of that act tobacco for which the farmer now realizes in the neighborhood of 12 cents a pound used to sell for 3, 5, 7, and sometimes as high as 8 or 9 cents a pound. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation will not be disturbed.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that a point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MURRAY. Pending the reservation I desire to move to strike out the last word, if that is necessary.

Mr. MANN. Under the practice the gentleman can proceed without a motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for five minutes.

TOBACCO AMERICA'S CIVILIZER.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the case advocated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM]. It is well known that of the three staple products of the South Kentucky has two—colonels and tobacco.

It is unfair to strike a great State like this, because tobacco has gone all down the line with the progress of our civilization. History tells us that in the early days of this country we used tobacco as money; that it was the basis of money like gold is the basis of it to-day. It was a "single standard"—of tobacco. So, you see, commerce was built up in this country by tobacco. It also discloses the fact that preachers were paid in the early days by giving them so many pounds of tobacco from each parish, and Patrick Henry won his celebrated case against the minister when he demanded 4,000 pounds of tobacco, because Henry thought that was too much tobacco for any one preacher. So it will be observed that religion was established by tobacco. Then, again, when the Colonies came to be settled, to make it possible for the development of this country, a corporation was organized to bring young women from Great Britain for the Jamestown colonies. It should be understood that the original colonists were all men—bachelors—and the price finally ran up to about 150 pounds of tobacco for each woman. So you will observe that the family relations were established in America by tobacco, and in all our progress, whether in commerce, religion, or the home, the altar and fireside, tobacco has played a great part. So it is unfair for this House to strike down a great product like that.

It will be noticed also that every people have a peculiar stimulant of their own. The Dutch have sauerkraut, the Mexican the tortilla and the cigaritto.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. I would like to ask the gentleman if in his opinion we are not these days substituting "chewing the rag" for chewing tobacco?

Mr. MURRAY. I will say to the gentleman that that is correct, but I still have a better substitute. Since tobacco has been so important as this, it is unfair to strike it down at this time. Each people, as I have said, has a peculiar stimulant. The Scotch like the old Scotch whisky. The German likes his glass of beer, but the real original, aboriginal American liked tobacco.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman is trying to interfere with the remarks that I am trying to make in his behalf and he ought not to interrupt me.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to find out what the gentleman's peculiar stimulant is.

Mr. MURRAY. My stimulant, sir, is tobacco, smoked in the form of a cigar or in a pipe. The gentleman objects, because he likes cigarettes. I dispise them—there is not enough tobacco in them. Therefore this provision ought to be retained in this bill, because it will not do to strike down any of the three great staple products to which I have referred. Kentucky can not deny that it outstrips all the States in the Union for colonels and tobacco. That State is full of colonels and the colonels are full of corn and tobacco. [Laughter.]

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, tobacco is the great equalizer, the great democratizer. It is the one substance, which, being fashionable between men, places them all on an equality; for the richest man would not hesitate to ask or give a chew of tobacco to the poorest, and all over the South the negro is at perfect liberty to ask a white man for a chew of tobacco. Some of you will doutbless remember the story that Gov. Bob Taylor told to audiences of "men only" about the old negro that used to waylay him on his way to his law offices. Some years ago an Indian in my State killed another Indian because he refused him a chew of tobacco when he had it. He regarded this refusal as the greatest of insults. It seems, however, that the Indian government did not consider it justifiable homicide, although there are those until this day who believe it should be.

But, to be serious about this question, the time is liable to come in the world when, by scarcity of land and because of the fact that tobacco eats soil as no other product does, as evidenced by the dilapidated tobacco barns in the tobacco-growing States where they have grown it for years, coupled with increase of population, all nations will have to prohibit the growth of tobacco as do the Chinese prohibit the pawpaw plant in their country. No country can grow tobacco without feeling this tremendous drain upon the soil. I presume, however, until that time comes we tobacco users will continue to make as great a progress as possible in its consumption.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, when I came into the Chamber a few moments ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] was speaking. I did not have the pleasure of listening to the first part of his remarks.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman will not deny that I have asked tobacco of the gentleman who now has the floor?

Mr. THOMAS. It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that he is trying to hedge now. He has a guilty conscience because he knows what I am going to tell about him. He was talking about stimulants, and said that the State of Kentucky is full of colonels and that the colonels are full of corn. That may be true, but there are others all over this broad land. The gentleman told the House that he used tobacco in the form of cigars and in a pipe. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have given him, since I have been here, at least $40 worth of chewing tobacco of the kind that I now hold in my hand, because he will not buy a cent's worth. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY. I admit that I do not chew enough tobacco to justify my buying it. I want to ask the gentleman if he expects to cut off my supply? [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. I will either have to cut off the gentleman's supply or get my salary raised in some way in order to supply him. [Laughter.] I do not know what the gentleman means by saying that he does not use enough tobacco to justify his buying it. I presume he must mean, from the quantity that he begs daily from me, that his salary is not sufficient to justify him in buying the supply of tobacco that he uses. I do not know what this item is that we are talking about, but if the item is something against tobacco, then I am against the item. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, Kentucky is the greatest tobacco State in this Union. We raise over a third of the tobacco that is raised in the United States, and there is one thing that I think ought to be done by our Government by way of reprisal, and that is to see to it that our tobacco is no longer made contraband of war. That is where I stand upon that proposition.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma made some allusion to Kentucky colonels. He seems to be jealous of Kentucky colonels. Kentucky colonels usually stay at home, and unless they have been driven out of the State for some good cause, which is very seldom, none of them ever go to Oklahoma, or, if they do, as soon as they see Oklahoma they return to the State of Kentucky and stay there forever after. If the gentleman from Oklahoma in his travels should ever wander into God's country, which is the old Kentucky home, he would find it so alluring that we would have to set a pack of hounds on him to run him out of the State. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen who have been so kind as to listen to me, and that is all I have to say at present, but if occasion requires I hereafter may extend my remarks on this subject. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in reference to the provision for quarterly reports upon tobacco.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reports now authorized by law are semiannual reports. They are made under the Cantrill law, with which the gentleman is familiar.

Mr. MANN. What is the necessity of having quarterly reports made permanent? I understand there might be some desire at present, due to the situation growing out of the war, for quarterly reports; but what is the need of quarterly reports permanently?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that there is a very great need of quarterly reports. The principal objection that has been made by those interested in the object sought to be accomplished by the Cantrill law is that these reports are not made often enough for the growers of tobacco. The gentleman understands that tobacco is housed in the late summer, cured, and in my State and the State of Kentucky put in the barns and sold during the winter and spring months. Now, the difficulty is that these reports coming, as they do, every six months do not afford to the growers of tobacco the information at the times necessary for them in order to be able to fix with any certainty the price they ought to receive.

Mr. MANN. Does the Department of Agriculture make any report or estimate in reference to tobacco as it does in reference to other things?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Department of Agriculture under the Bureau of Cotton Estimates makes a report by way of estimate concerning the amount of tobacco which will be grown or probably produced.

Mr. HELM. Annually.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is purely an estimate.

Mr. MANN. They make an estimate more often than annually?

Mr. HELM. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I am quite confident that is correct.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. They make reports and estimates of the production of all of these farm products more often than annually.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. MANN. They make a final statement of an estimate, which of course is only annual.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. Very recently there was before the Committee of the Census, of which I am chairman, a representative from the Treasury Department, from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue's office, who stated positively that the Department of Agriculture formerly sent a corps of clerks to the commissioner's office to secure and publish the annual report of the quantity of tobacco that was shown to have passed from the growers' hands into the dealers' hands. Now, there was only one publication. The value of all of this work is publicity, and the fact is, as the gentleman very well understands, that when all of this information is gathered and not published broadcast among the growers it is of no value whatever. I can assure the gentleman that there is only one publication of the statistics by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MANN. There is only one at a time; I am sure of that.

Mr. HELM. Annually.

Mr. MANN. Oh, in their crop estimates they make more than one estimate of the production of tobacco and of other farm products as to what will be the production. Perhaps there is only one estimate of what has been the production.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman will yield a little bit further. The defect with the publication by the Department of Agriculture, coming at the time it does, on the 1st of July, as my information goes, is when it is of the least value to the grower of tobacco. The tobacco crop is harvested, so to speak, in the latter part of the summer. It is stored in the barns and remains there until the rainy season in the fall.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the estimate of the Department of Agriculture as to the annual production of farm products is not made until the 1st of July of the succeeding year?

Mr. HELM. That is my information.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is entirely mistaken, notwithstanding he is chairman of the Committee on the Census. That is not the case. The estimate made about the 1st of July or during the months throughout the year is an estimate of the probable production, based upon the acreage, of what will be the amount of production.

Mr. HELM. I am speaking about the only publication that the Department of Agriculture makes.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is mistaken; they make more than one publication.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will submit, if the gentleman will pardon me, that the report made by the Department of Agriculture with reference to the amount of tobacco which may be produced, or even which has been produced, does not serve any real purpose or a beneficial purpose to the grower in so far as enabling him to determine with any degree of certainty what his tobacco should bring. Now, under this Cantrill law, as the gentleman knows, the Director of the Census is directed to secure information and make that information public as to the amount of leaf tobacco on hand.

Mr. MANN. And consumed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And consumed. So in that sense——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In that sense, I want to say to the gentleman, the report of the Department of Agriculture does not meet the real situation in so far as the grower is concerned.

Mr. MANN. What is the special reason which differentiates tobacco from wheat or corn? Wheat and corn are carried over by the producer.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, there might be a number of reasons given. The gentleman no doubt has had his attention called to the fact that a number of years ago the tobacco grower was compelled to sell his tobacco for probably one-third of its real value, for much less in many cases than it actually cost to produce it, on account of the fact that there was a combination or a trust which controlled the market.

Mr. MANN. I have heard that statement frequently made on the floor of this House about every farm product and factory, but I never have credited all of those statements.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman was familiar with the situation as it existed down in Tennessee and Kentucky, I am sure he would appreciate the fact that that was particularly true of tobacco. There can be no question about that fact. Now, that being so, the trust now—and there is a Tobacco Trust, as we all know, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was intended to dissolve it——

Mr. MANN. I do not know that there is any such trust, and I could not believe that the Supreme Court, having dissolved one trust, the present Attorney General would lie idle if everybody knew there was another trust. I do not know anything about it, and I do not care, so far as these legislative propositions are concerned.

May I ask the gentleman further in reference to the need of establishing a division called the "Division of cotton and tobacco statistics" as a separate division in the Census Office, What is the need of a separate, independent division there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman the Director of the Census states that if there was such a division he would be able to collect the information and to disseminate it more systematically and more successfully than he is now able to do. The gentleman knows that there are about $240,000 appropriated under this item; $225,000 of this is appropriated for the collection of cotton statistics, and the sum of $15,000 for tobacco statistics. This division, if created, of course, will have charge of the work to be performed under this appropriation; and the Director of the Census, if Congress shall authorize the division, will, no doubt, put at the head of it a competent man—whether the man now in charge or some other I do not know, but a man who will have particular charge of that particular work.

Mr. MANN. Now, the Director of the Census is a good man, so far as I know. I do not recall now, to my own ignorance, who is filling the office. I think Mr. Harris went out, did he not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. Mr. Rogers, of North Carolina, was appointed to succeed him, and he is a splendid and most competent official.

Mr. MANN. We have several bills reported from the Committee on the Census at this session of Congress. If the Director of the Census desired this, why did he not apply to have a bill brought in and considered in the ordinary way establishing such a division?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not answer the gentleman. I want to be entirely fair and frank——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman always is, or I would not take the trouble to ask him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have upon my own initiative discussed this matter with the Director of the Census a number of times, and in the course of the conversation that we had it was suggested that a division would be advisable in order to more thoroughly systematize the work being done under this appropriation. I would not want to be understood as saying that the Director of the Census had submitted an estimate or even a request in writing that this be done.

Mr. MANN. I understand very well, and I have great confidence in the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the subcommittee. I am quite well aware, I think, that this item would not be in the bill if the gentleman from Tennessee, or some other gentleman from Tennessee, or from North Carolina, or from Kentucky, had not been chairman of the subcommittee. I make no reflection in that at all, as the gentleman well understands, because of the fact that the gentleman comes from a locality where special interests are involved, which fact brings a closer knowledge to him than others would have ordinarily. I do not know that I am disposed to stand in the way of gentlemen who are all the time insisting upon doing more work for cotton and tobacco, though never willing, so far as my observation goes, or seldom willing, to do anything for the great products of the West and the North—corn, grain, and live stock.

Mr. CANTRILL. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me to offer a suggestion to him, it is this, in answer to his question, there is no special selfish interest in this proposition especially.

Mr. MANN. Not to the gentleman on the floor. Of course there is a special interest and a proper selfish interest to anyone who wants to buy and sell products and wants information.

Mr. CANTRILL. There is not alone a selfish interest.

Mr. MANN. There is no improper interest, of course.

Mr. CANTRILL. The United States Government secures a tremendous amount of revenue through the internal-revenue department in the collection of taxes on tobacco that it does not secure from wheat, corn, and other products. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me that the interests of the Government are well protected in legislation of this character, as well as the interests of the tobacco grower.

Mr. MANN. I can not see how the Government is interested in the matter——

Mr. CANTRILL. The Government, as well as the grower, is more thoroughly protected in the collection of these statistics under the operation of this law, and it makes it of general interest, as well as of individual interest to the tobacco growers. There are between forty and fifty million dollars per year taken by the Federal Government in the way of taxes from our tobacco interests.

Mr. MANN. It has nothing to do with these statistics.

Mr. CANTRILL. It is of great interest to the internal-revenue department in the collection of taxes. It is of great value to the Government, if the gentleman will permit me, and I think I am not mistaken——

Mr. MANN. These statistics are interesting to persons who grow tobacco, to the persons who own tobacco, and especially to those who buy tobacco for manufacture. They may be interesting to the gentlemen who smoke tobacco or chew tobacco. I wondered awhile ago whether the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] were seeking to disqualify themselves from the right to vote on the proposition because they chew tobacco.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I have finished, and the gentleman can take the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas: Amend page 122, line 20, after the figures "$512,000," by inserting the following:

"And provided further, That the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce be, and is hereby, authorized under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce to collect for the census reports and publish from time to time statistics of the production and consumption of cotton and cotton goods in foreign countries, including the number of spindles in activity, number of cotton bales on hand, amount of cotton goods on hand, value of same, construction of new mills, closing down of mills, demand for and probable purchasers of cotton and cotton goods, and methods of merchandising the same. That in order to carry into effect the above provision the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to appoint four expert agents to cover England, France, Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy, China, Japan, and India, and an additional sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to be expended in carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including clerical assistants in the District of Columbia or elsewhere or to secure by purchase or otherwise such reports, manuscripts, and publications as may be necessary to carry out in the most efficient manner the provisions of this act."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order on the amendment.

[Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. EAGLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 9225. An act granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennesee. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in sympathy with the object that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] seeks to accomplish. I appreciate the importance, and I was about to say almost the necessity, of bringing the producer in closer touch with the ultimate consumer. I want to remind the gentleman from Texas of the fact that the Secretary of Commerce, in his statement before our committee, of which he is a very valuable and able member, stated that under the law as it exists now, if any organization of cotton producers, if any organization of tobacco producers, or the producers of any other agricultural product, wanted or sought the aid and support of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce he would most gladly put them in touch with consumers in foreign markets. He stated further that under the law as it exists to-day he was in a position to render this great service to any organization of producers, whether of cotton or any other agricultural product.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Does the gentleman not remember that the Secretary of Commerce stated that there was a gap in the law; that it had been complained of from Texas; and that under the law he could not procure these statistics included in the amendment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So far, possibly, as some of the statistics included in this amendment are concerned, that may be true; but what I was trying to say was this: That the Secretary of Commerce stated that he would very gladly render to any organization of cotton producers or of any other agricultural product in this country the same service that he is rendering to manufacturers in this country.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Does not the gentleman remember that in that hearing the Secretary of Commerce and the man who was in charge of that Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce stated that they were just approaching the point of bringing the foreign purchaser of our manufactured products into direct contact with the producers of that product, and that if we would give them this money they would do it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the Secretary of Commerce, in the discussion relative to the 40,000 bales contracted for by Russian parties for the next five years, to state, when the gentleman from Texas asked him why this service could not be rendered to the producer, that he would very gladly put any organization of cotton producers in touch with the parties in Russia or anywhere else.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman states that there is full authority in law to carry out the purposes of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I did not make the statement that broad. I was referring to the remark of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] relative to putting the producer in closer touch with the ultimate consumer.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true; but, as I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, that is not the ultimate end of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's amendment seeks to get information rather than to put them in touch.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My statement was simply in reply to the remark of the gentleman from Texas, with which I am very much in accord. I heartily agree with him in what he says. Now, if an amendment of this kind was adopted on this bill it would, in my judgment, entail a great deal of cost. No one can even estimate how much it would cost. This amendment provides for the collection of statistics of the production and consumption of cotton and cotton goods in all foreign countries, including the number of spindles in activity in all foreign countries; the number of cotton bales on hand in foreign countries; the amount of cotton goods on hand in foreign countries, and the value of same; the construction of new mills; the closing down of mills; the demand for and probable purchasers of cotton and cotton goods and the methods of merchandising the same. Now, I submit that I can hardly imagine an amendment which could be more broad in its terms, and, in my judgment, instead of $25,000 being sufficient to carry out the purposes of this amendment, Congress would necessarily have to appropriate hundreds of thousands of dollars in order to collect that information from all the foreign countries.

Mr. GOOD. In order to get that information would it not be necessary to have appraisers, not only in the wholesale establishments abroad, but in every country store, to find out the amount of cotton goods on hand?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely. As the gentleman from Iowa so well suggests, they would have to go into every little retail store in foreign countries.

Now, the point I want to make is this, in explanation of my action in reserving the point of order. I think this matter is of sufficient importance to deserve consideration by the House in a regular legislative way. I do not think a matter involving as much as this does, with all of its ramifications, involving as large an appropriation as it necessarily will, ought to be put upon an appropriation bill. I think that the gentleman from Texas, as he possibly has done, or as he no doubt will do if he has not already done it, should introduce a bill on this subject, let it go to the regular legislative committee which has jurisdiction of it, and let that committee consider it in all of its details, and then report it to this House before legislation of this kind is put upon the statute books.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill. It is clearly legislative, and in addition to that, it is clearly not germane. It requires that the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce shall be required to do certain things, and it is not germane to the paragraph now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] offers an amendment, which the Chair will not take the time to read in full, it having been read by the Clerk.

To this amendment the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] makes the point of order.

Under the rules of the House it is not in order to legislate on appropriation bills unless the legislation comes within the purview of the Holman rule by retrenching expenditures in one of the methods stated in the rule.

The Chair is aware that the usual practice of the House is that where a provision is inserted in an appropriation bill that is of itself subject to a point of order and allowed to remain in the bill it is in order further to amend that provision by germane amendments. But the rulings of the House have been that it is not in order to amend such a paragraph by adding additional affirmative legislation; that the amendment must be germane and must add no new legislation.

The Chair cites section 3836 of Hinds' Precedents:

In an appropriation bill a paragraph embodying legislation may be perfected by a germane amendment, but this does not permit an amendment which adds additional legislation.

The same principle is stated in paragraph 3837, in a ruling by Mr. Burton, and also a ruling by Vice President Sherman when he was a Member of this House. The same principle is also enunciated in paragraph 3838 of Hinds' Precedents.

The Chair can not escape the conclusion, from the reading of the amendment, that it adds additional legislation. While the Chair believes that the proviso of the paragraph in the bill, which taints the whole paragraph, is subject to the point of order, yet that having been withdrawn, the paragraph is subject to germane amendment which does not add new legislation.

But the Chair thinks the amendment in question does add new legislation, and for that reason sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HELM: Insert after the word "statistics," in line 17, on page 22, the following:

"Provided further, That hereafter the Director of the Census may procure the information for the tobacco reports required by this act and the act approved April 30, 1912, by mail or by special agents or by other employees of the Bureau of the Census."

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the amendment.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to get real efficient results from this appropriation of $15,000 carried in this bill for the collection of tobacco statistics. This is a kind of work that might not improperly be classed as a detective duty.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. I will.

Mr. GOOD. How is this information obtained at present?

Mr. HELM. By mail.

Mr. GOOD. Would not the commissioner have the authority without the adoption of your amendment to secure the information through the mails?

Mr. HELM. That is the law, and that is where the law is deficient.

Mr. GOOD. If I understood the gentleman's amendment, it was to secure information by mail.

Mr. HELM. To secure it by mail and, where he is not satisfied with the results that he gets by mail, to send a man into the locality to check up. The fact is the Tobacco Trust has its special agents; they are all the time busy. They are in the field getting information, first hand, from the crop as it looks in the field, from the crop as it hangs in the barn—in short, from the time the crop is pitched until disposed of they have their emissaries—trained, skilled men—right on the ground. What we need, what the grower needs, is a limited number of men used to the practices and methods of the Tobacco Trust, who can go to the centers like Louisville, Cincinnati, Lexington, or wherever leaf houses are operated, and check up the quantity of tobacco that is reported in the hands of these dealers in this product. It takes a man who understands the trade, who understands the methods of the trust. In other words there is an old saying that "It takes a thief to catch a thief." You have to have men who know the tobacco business in order to get beneficial results from the expenditure of this $15,000. Simply writing out to a dealer and asking have you so many pounds of tobacco on hand is not enough; he will write you back that he has or has not. The Bureau of the Census must depend solely and exclusively on the truthfulness of that report.

The situation is something like this: In the manufacture of distilled spirits at the distilleries the Government has its storekeeper and gaugers, and these men look after the quantity of distilled spirits, and the grower of tobacco needs just such a type of man to look after the interests of the grower to see how much tobacco is in the hands of the big dealers, who handle millions upon millions of pounds of tobacco. As I stated a while ago on the floor, 50,000,000 pounds of tobacco was unaccounted for by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and except for the services of a special agent who went into the Louisville tobacco warehouse market and discovered the fact that this concern was permitted to carry in its possession this enormous quantity of tobacco that was unaccounted for—that very incident, I think, is a strong illustration of the necessity of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi insist upon his point of order?

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not subject to a point of order. It seems to me that you have here an appropriation of $15,000 authorized for a specific purpose, and this amendment is simply directory as to how that particular sum of money shall be spent. It does not entail a cent more expense to the Government. If you want results, it seems to me that this is the one method of getting what you want.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask the gentleman if it has not been the custom of the Census Bureau heretofore to get the information by special agent, until they construed the act in such a way that they claimed it did not authorize it; that recently it has been held by the solicitor that it was not right to send out special agents, but that they did get it very generally in that way until it was so held.

Mr. HELM. According to my information, the gentleman from Tennessee is quite correct. Mr. Harris, former Director of the Census, did appoint special agents, but under a recent ruling of the department the present Director of the Census felt that he was not warranted in spending the money in the manner indicated by my amendment. This is simply to make it more specific, certain, and definite.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the proper number of special agents being appointed, but there has been no recommendation from the Department of the Census as to the amount of territory to be covered and no estimate about the number of special agents that might be needed, and so we would be absolutely in the dark as to the number of special agents that might be needed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to the fact that this bill limits the appropriation that may be used for this purpose to $15,000, and necessarily there could not be many special agents appointed for that amount. Here is the difficulty, if the gentleman will pardon me. The Cantrill law provided for the collection of tobacco statistics, but no provision was made by which they may be collected except through the mails. The Director of the Census states that it is absolutely impossible to secure any accurate information by means of the mail; that it is not his purpose to appoint agents by the wholesale, and, as a matter of fact, he could not do it, because he only has $15,000; but I understand from the Director that if he had the authority it would be his idea to endeavor as soon as possible to collect the information as to the tobacco in much the same manner as it is collected.

Mr. SISSON. You have $15,000 and your amendment provides for four special agents.

Mr. HELM. No.

Mr. SISSON. You have tobacco raised in Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Virginia, and Tennessee, and perhaps a little tobacco in other places. How many agents would be necessary to take an accurate census of tobacco?

Mr. HELM. The only answer that I can make to the gentleman is that the former director, Mr. Harris, I believe, appointed five.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is aware that in collecting the statistics of cotton the agent can go to the ginner and get what is called a ginner's report, for all of the cotton must be ginned. Without some information from the committee as to whether or not this will be instituting a policy of going to every tobacco farmer, which would be an interminable task——

Mr. HELM. Oh, that is not the purpose.

Mr. SISSON. Then how is it proposed to do it?

Mr. HELM. Let me explain to the gentleman. The Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. is a concern that, I suppose, covers at least six or seven blocks on Main Street in Louisville, and where there is, I should say, half a billion pounds of tobacco cleared annually from the grower to the dealer.

Mr. SISSON. Is it proposed that this man shall go simply to the warehouse or go to the farms to get the information?

Mr. HELM. Go to the warehouse. To the dealers. He goes to the dealer and goes through his books.

Mr. SISSON. If the gentleman's amendment should provide so that we might not embark upon the practice of going to each tobacco farmer, if it provided that it should be at the warehouse where he should get his information, I would have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HELM. I have no objection to the gentleman making that amendment.

Mr. SISSON. The reason I would not like to suggest it myself is because I do not know anything about the tobacco business.

Mr. HELM. No man on earth would do such a thing. It would be an unbusinesslike proposition.

Mr. SISSON. I want the amendment to be in such shape as to show that we are not going to undertake to send an agent to every tobacco farmer in the country.

Mr. HELM. Say, not exceeding five special agents or four special agents.

Mr. SISSON. I do not object to the number of special agents. I am willing to leave that to the Census Department, if the gentleman's amendment will provide that the census shall be taken at the place where the tobacco is collected.

Mr. HELM. It could not be taken any place else.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to suggest that the Director of the Census has been heretofore collecting these statistics just in this way, by the use of a few special agents, and he thought he had the right to do it under the law until he was advised by the solicitor that he did not have that right. Since then he has been at a standstill because he realized the fact that he could not possibly get it through the mail reliably and accurately.

Mr. SISSON. I would like to examine the amendment for a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not the intention of the act itself, whose author is the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL], that any agent of the Government should go to the farmers. That would be a physical impossibility for the Government to employ enough agents to go to every farmer to see how much tobacco he might have on hand, without employing an unlimited number. It is contemplated by the act itself that these investigations and reports shall be obtained at the factory, and the amendment which my colleague has introduced is simply an amendment authorizing the Census Bureau to do what it has heretofore done.

Mr. SISSON. Suppose the amendment should provide that it shall be secured at the factory or at the tobacco warehouse?

Mr. HELM. Let us say from the dealer.

Mr. SISSON. Procure from the dealer the information for the tobacco reports?

Mr. HELM. That would be all right—

Provided further, That hereafter the Director of the Census may procure from the dealer the information for the tobacco reports.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment if it is absolutely certain that you do not undertake to go further than the warehouse or the place where the tobacco is collected—at some fixed point where you could enumerate the number of men as you can in the case of the cotton gin. The cotton could not be marketed unless it is put in the bales, and therefore you have a fixed and definite number that you can absolutely enumerate. If the agents know the exact place which they are to visit, then the amendment will not meet with any opposition so far as I am concerned. If the amendment shall fix the place, I have no objection to it.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state this, that the agents will know exactly to whom to go, because every dealer, manufacturer, and so forth, must register, and their names must be on file in the department.

Mr. SISSON. So far as I am concerned, then, I am willing to withdraw the point of order if you will put in the words "procure from the dealer."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that in orderly legislation the distinguished gentleman who offered this amendment, who is the chairman of a legislative committee having jurisdiction over the subject, ought to introduce a bill and report it to the House with carefully chosen language?

Mr. SISSON. Perhaps that would be better, but I will say to the gentleman that coming from a tobacco State, and being chairman of that committee, and having given the matter a careful study, as I presume he has, because I am told there is a bill pending before his committee, I would defer to his judgment if the amendment be one which would be harmless in so far as the number of agents is concerned.

Mr. MANN. I would rather defer to his judgment after he has reported the bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time, if the gentleman from Kentucky offers the amendment which I have suggested, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin also reserved the point of order. If the point of order is to be insisted upon the Chair will be glad to hear any member of the committee who desires to discuss the point of order. If not, the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I wish to say that our committee was very considerate of the welfare of the tobacco interests, and we unanimously approved of this recommendation submitted by the chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee. We wished to obtain these statistics, but in making my point of order I do it because I think that it is necessary for orderly legislation. We do not know how far we are going in this authorization under the amendment submitted, and we are in sympathy with the idea; otherwise we would not have agreed unanimously to have reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. I make the point of order.

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, I desire to submit this point before the Chair rules. This legislation in the bill now being authorized in this section, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], as I understand it, simply provides a method to put into effect this new legislation that is already in the section and on which the point of order has not been raised by the House but has been passed in that way. Now, the whole question to be determined is whether or not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is germane to the legislation which is now pending before the House, which simply provides a method of putting into effect legislation which is incorporated in the bill. Therefore I think the Chair could very well rule that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Under the rules of the House, legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill unless within one of the exceptions provided by clause 2 Rule XXI. Now, the Chair is frank to say that the amendment a few moments ago ruled out by the Chair, as well as this, has the personal sympathy of the Chair, but in passing on a point of order a Chairman can not follow the question of whether an amendment is meritorious or not, but must rule in accordance with the rules and precedents. It is admitted upon the floor of the House that the executive head of the Census Office could not do what this amendment authorizes him to do; that the solicitor has ruled it was contrary to law. The Chair in his ruling before stated the precedents showing that it is a generally accepted rule of the House that if a provision is in a bill subject to a point of order, the proposition is further amendable by a germane amendment providing no new matter or new legislation or any new proposition that of itself will be subject to a point of order is offered. Under the law the Census Office gets these returns by mail. The amendment in question provides that hereafter they can get them by mail or they can get them by special agent, or by other employees of the Census Office. The Chair is forced to conclude that this adds additional new matter and new legislation, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 122, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and 4 down to the word "quarterly," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "For securing information for census reports, provided by law semimonthly reports of domestic and foreign cotton production, periodical reports of stocks of baled cotton in the United States and foreign countries, and the domestic and foreign consumption of cotton and cotton goods."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am not conversant in parliamentary law, but it seems to me where the current law fixes the duty of a department that any amendment that does not add to that duty, but is a fair construction of that duty under the law is in order. Now, if you will note the general statute, it provides—I shall read it to the Chair:

It shall be the province and duty of said bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, to foster, promote, and develop the various manufacturing industries of the United States and markets for the same at home and abroad, domestic and foreign, by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such industries and such markets, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the Secretary or provided by law.

Now, it is evident that that information is in the interests of our foreign markets—of our foreign trade—and it is merely a direction to him to procure that under this law. It does not add 1 cent to the appropriation and, it seems to me, it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to see the statute.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. I will send it to the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN (continuing). To the provision in the bill—

For securing information for census reports, provided for by law, semimonthly reports of cotton production, periodical reports of stock of baled cotton in the United States, and of the domestic and foreign consumption of cotton.

I am not sure that there is any law providing for semimonthly reports of cotton production.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. That is already in the bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know it is in the bill, and the gentleman now proposes to insert a direction as to what this report shall contain, foreign and domestic cotton production. In other words, to very much extend the scope of the work authorized by the bill and also authorized by the law. This bill provides for the periodical report of stock of baled cotton in the United States. As I understand the amendment, it extends that jurisdiction over foreign cotton. I am not sure that is the way the amendment reads, but in several cases, as I gathered the amendment as read, it extended very materially the scope of the work that is now being done and provided for work that is not now authorized by law; part of this work is not authorized by law, except the appropriation act.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, where I claim it is provided for by law is in the section creating the Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce. Its duties are prescribed by the Department of Commerce to collect all available information that will aid our foreign markets. Now, I do not know and I would like to ask this: Are we confined to a specific Census Bureau in ascertaining or making appropriations or amending a bill, or can not we take any other section of the law directing the duties of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. MANN. That would depend upon the language of the law. Of course, if the law provides that the Department of Commerce shall collect certain information, you can not change that in an appropriation bill. You have got to leave that to the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and make your appropriation to the Department of Commerce. Of course, he would have authority to have it done by any bureau under his jurisdiction, but where the law in general terms provides that something shall be done by one of the departments it is not in order on the appropriation bill to specify a particular thing to be done, though that might come within the scope of the general language. You can not modify that general language to things of this kind.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the proposition falls within the general scope of the fundamental law creating the Department of Commerce and is in no wise a limitation upon the duties of the head of that department, is it not in order on an appropriation bill to appropriate for such specific proposition?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly; but that is not this case.

Mr. LEVER. I am not so sure of that; but I think we could reach it further on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this enlarges the law for obtaining these statistics, as the amendment in question specifically directs that a report be made as to the consumption of cotton goods in foreign countries. Under the rules of this House if any part of an amendment is subject to a point of order the whole amendment is not in order. The Chair could base his ruling on that proposition, but, in addition, the Chair believes this amendment changes existing law and does not fall within one of the accepted classes. Therefore the Chair is forced to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "cotton," in line 2, page 122, the words "apple, hay, potato, and tomato."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 122, after the word "cotton," in line 2, insert "apple, hay, potato, tomato."

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, the Chair is one of the best parliamentarians in either branch of Congress and, of course, is familiar with the fact, with which some of us happen to be, that an amendment adding a new subject to a proposition relating to but one subject is not germane. But this particular paragraph relates to two subjects, to wit, cotton and tobacco. It has been held in the decisions of this house, as the Chair is aware, that to a bill authorizing the admission of one Territory as a State the addition of another Territory by way of amendment was not germane, because the bill related to the admission of the particular State. But where a bill related to the admission of two States it is perfectly permissible to offer an amendment adding a third State, on the ground that the scope of the bill was the admission of States.

Now, my amendment falls absolutely within the latter ruling. This paragraph relates to statistics in relation to two subjects—cotton and tobacco. If it is proper—and this House has now said it is proper by failing to object—to acquire statistics in relation to cotton and tobacco, then the House has determined to go into the business of obtaining statistics in relation to crop products. It just happens that the products I name in the amendment are products which are raised largely in the State which I have the honor to in part represent, and the city which I represent in part has the honor of having within its confines the largest tomato farm in the world. And if there is any benefit to be derived from statistics, and they are permissible, then we are just as much entitled to the benefit as any other part of the country. And I have found that as you journey through life you do not get much of what you are entitled to as you go along—do not get much chance—and therefore my amendment is entirely germane. And on that I am perfectly willing for the Chair to rule.

Mr. FESS. Will you not accept a modification by adding "onions"? That is an important production of my State.

Mr. BENNET. I will. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by adding the word "onion."

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from New York object to adding the words "live stock"?

Mr. KING. Will you object to adding the word "corn"?

Mr. BENNET. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it will be made bombproof by adding these different varieties?

Mr. BENNET. Of course not. The amendment is not subject to the point of order as it is, but on the groundwork of my argument these are admissible. Let us add all the crop products of the United States. I do not represent any farmers of a particular district——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman feels that way about it, why does he not do as the Representatives from those sections that thought it necessary to collect statistics on cotton and tobacco did and introduce a bill on the subject in order to secure legislation?

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman forgets that I was elected at a special election and have not had a chance to grasp all these trivial details. I have not had a chance to catch up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recalls the decision that the gentleman from New York cites, and the Chair thinks he can differentiate this situation, or, at least, not pass upon those precedents as cited. Those precedents relate to the germaneness of an amendment. The Chair can decide this point of order setting aside the question of germaneness, because on an appropriation bill it is not in order to legislate. The amendment in question is new, affirmative legislation, and, according to the precedent cited a few moment ago, one by the late Vice President, if a provision in a bill is subject to a point of order, you can not further amend it by adding further legislation. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Chief, $6,000; assistant chiefs—1, $3,500, 1, $3,000; chiefs of divisions—1, $2,500, 1, $2,000; assistant chiefs of divisions—1, 2,250; chief clerk, $2,250; experts—1 on commerce and finance, $2,000; translators—1, $2,000, 1, $1,400; stenographer to chief of bureau, $1,600; clerks—10 of class 4, 6 of class 3, 1, $1,500, 16 of class 2, 15 of class 1, 15 at $1,000 each, 14 at $900 each; messenger; 4 assistant messengers; 2 laborers; in all, $130,640.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, in line 6, before the figures "2,250," I notice the dollar mark is left out. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the insertion will be made. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To further promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, $125,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That not exceeding $3,000 of this sum may be expended for the purchase of documents, manuscripts, plans, specifications, and other publications necessary for the promotion of our commercial interests: Provided further, That out of this sum there may be expended $2,000 for the employment of an editorial assistant and $1,600 for an editorial clerk, in Washington, D. C., to edit the reports of the field agents employed under this appropriation.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 123, line 23, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon and add the following: "And provided further, That out of this sum there may be expended $25,000 for the collection and publication, from time to time, of statistics of production and consumption of, and demand for, cotton and cotton goods in foreign countries."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that, unless the gentleman desires to use some time.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman to reserve his point of order for a moment, although I do not think the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee reserve the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, cotton is the chief export crop of this country. Over 60 per cent of the cotton produced in the United States is sold in foreign markets. Cotton is one of the most sensitive of all the crops. A great southern orator on one occasion said that "the crawling of a worm from the leaf of a cotton plant would cause shivers to run up and down the back of the Czar of Russia." And that is almost literally true. It is a highly speculative crop and the machinery for its marketing is finely adjusted.

Under existing law the Census Bureau collects statistics of cotton as regards its production and its consumption in this country. Cotton, in truth, gentlemen, is the most watched after plant that grows. We watch it from the time the seed is dropped until the cotton is ginned and manufactured into cloth. We are now appropriating large sums of money in the Department of Agriculture—I do not recall the exact amount—for watching from time to time the growing condition of the cotton crop, and then early in December of each year we issue an estimate of the probable production of cotton during that cotton year, and in addition to that, as I have already said, we publish bimonthly, through the Census Bureau, the ginning figures, showing the amount of cotton that is being ginned from time to time. All this is done to put the producer and manufacturer in complete possession of all the facts concerning the crop.

So, then, we are furnishing to the world a complete picture of the production end of the cotton industry. We are showing to those who are demanding cotton, who are in need of cotton for manufacturing purposes, the sources of supply and the amount of supply. We are likewise showing the amount of cotton consumed in our various manufacturing establishments in this country.

The purpose of this amendment is to provide for the showing of these same facts as to all producing and consuming countries of cotton. We believe in the doctrine that for a game to be a good, square, American game the cards ought to be played on the top of the table. As it is now, we are playing one side of the hand on the top of the table and the other side of the hand is being played under the table.

The purpose of this amendment is to provide this Bureau of Foreign Commerce with the power and the money to collect statistics of the production of cotton in foreign countries, to collect statistics of the consumption of cotton in foreign countries, and to collect statistics of the demand for cotton and cotton goods in foreign countries. With these facts the cotton picture would be complete and full to the trade.

Now, this is not a proposition that confines itself entirely to the cotton producer. Not at all. It is exceedingly important to him; it is probably more important to him than to any other class of people in this country. But it is also a proposition of tremendous importance to the cotton manufacturer of this country. It is a matter of great importance to my friends from Massachusetts, to gentlemen on the other side of this House who are representing cotton-manufacturing districts or States. It is important to their people that they should know the amount of cotton that is being produced in the world, the amount of cotton that is being consumed in the different parts of the world, and the amount of demand for cotton and cotton goods in the different parts of the world, and the sources of demand.

Mr. Chairman, we are not collecting all of these figures at this time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has alluded to a letter written by the chief of this bureau to the effect that they had been endeavoring to gather these figures through consular agents, but that the machinery was entirely inadequate and could furnish only relatively inaccurate data. What we want to do is to provide an appropriation sufficient to enable this bureau to employ four or five specially trained men who can gather for American commerce, American manufacture, and agriculture these very important facts. This, in brief, is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish me to yield?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is through, I wish to make a request.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, if the Chair desires I would be glad to discuss the point of order, so that if the amendment is held to be in order there may be further discussion of the amendment.

Under leave to extend my remarks I desire to submit the following correspondence between Hon. Clarence Ousley, of Texas, and myself upon this proposition:

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., November 16, 1915.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Eagle sends me your letter of November 4 in acknowledgment of a letter from him inclosing one from me in regard to information concerning foreign consumption of cotton. On account of your interest in the matter I take the liberty of communicating my views on the point mentioned in your letter to the effect that the officials of the Census Bureau say that they have no way of compelling foreign countries to give up these facts.

That is true, but we can get the facts none the less if our consuls are instructed to persevere and to report the best information they can obtain. This is the point of particular difficulty, but the difficulty is rather in the mind of the Department of Commerce at Washington than in the situation itself. In 1913 I visited the conference of the spinners at The Hague and appealed to the manufacturers to give us this information. The leading spirits of the organization, especially Sir Charles McCara, of England, and Mr. Arthur Kuffler, of Austria, agreed with me that we ought to have it, but they said they could not immediately persuade their associates to furnish it. However, they volunteered the suggestion that if our Government would persist the spinners would be compelled finally to yield.

Just before my visit to The Hague I visited Egypt and had interviewed Mr. Gerald Dudgeon, the director general of agriculture for Lord Kitchener and really the brains of the Kitchener government in respect to all economic matters. My hope was to get pressure from Egypt in behalf of the Egyptian producers. Mr. Dudgeon was in entire sympathy, but he advised me then that the spinners of the Lancashire district would not readily give the information, and that since Lancashire constitutes a sort of balance of power in British politics, no British ministry would risk offending that district by requiring the information from the spinners. But Mr. Dudgeon made the point that if our consuls would report monthly estimates from the best sources they could find, the spinners in due course would see the importance of giving us precise information.

In this connection I beg to remind you that long before our Government began reporting the condition and the output of the cotton crop the spinners made estimates from time to time, and that these estimates, being, as they generally were, rather exaggerated in favor of the spinning interests, constituted an important reason why our Government should give accurate information. In like manner Mr. Dudgeon suggests that for us, through our consuls, to make estimates would be the quickest way to persuade the British spinners to tell us the truth. Allow me to say in this connection that any intelligent man in Manchester can form a fair idea of what cotton consumption is by merely ascertaining whether the mills are running on full time. As I said in my letter to the Texas delegation, any shopkeeper can tell that much. Moreover, our consuls at the principal jobbing and distributing centers can easily ascertain the general truth concerning the cotton trade, and these facts will give us an approximate idea from time to time of the consumption of cotton in foreign countries.

All these points I have repeatedly presented to the Department of Commerce and the department is now giving some useful information, but it lacks specific information from Great Britain, the chief user of our cotton. It should unhesitatingly make estimates of British consumption in the manner I have indicated, and if it will do so for a few months I have no manner of doubt that, as Mr. Dudgeon suggests and as Sir Charles McCara and Mr. Kuffler agreed, the spinners will show us their books.

Since the Department of Commerce is not inclined to pursue this method, it will be necessary for some mandate to be written into the law. I do not hesitate to say that any intelligent man in normal times can gather a fair idea of cotton consumption in the spinning district of England, just as you or I could go to Fall River or to any other spinning center and by interviews with merchants and bankers ascertain the general condition of the spinning industry.

Permit me to add, without flattery, that you have rendered a great service to the cotton growers and to the Nation in the two acts affecting agriculture which bear your name, but I believe that the additional service which I suggest in regard to statistics of foreign consumption will more immediately and more materially reveal the economic value and affect the price of cotton than anything else you have done, and I almost envy you the opportunity to render this further service, which I believe is easy in your position of influence in the Congress at this time.

Yours, very truly, CLARENCE OUSLEY, Director.

NOVEMBER 23, 1915.

Mr. CLARENCE OUSLEY,
College Station, Tex.

MY DEAR MR. OUSLEY: Just as soon as I can get a moment of time I shall take up the matter of your letter of November 16 with Secretary Redfield, of the Department of Commerce. Just at this time I am working night and day with the joint committee on rural credits, and until we have reached some conclusion with reference to that I do not care to burden my mind with any other proposition. I recognize that there is a great deal in what you say, and before very long I shall take it up and see what can be done. I thank you for writing me.

Very truly,

A. F. LEVER.

NOVEMBER 25, 1915.

Mr. CLARENCE OUSLEY,
College Station, Tex.

MY DEAR MR. OUSLEY: Yesterday I had an opportunity to talk with Secretary Redfield with reference to the contents of your letter of November 16. We went into the matter very thoroughly, and I found him in sympathy with your suggestions. It is his belief, however—and I agree with it—that we will need additional authority in law, together with some appropriation, to enable the department to undertake this work upon a plan which is likely to bring the largest results. As soon as Congress meets I shall introduce a bill or prepare an amendment to one of the appropriation bills to provide for this work, and I pledge you to do my best to put it through. If, in the meantime, you can furnish me your own idea, in extenso, of the value of such statistics to the producer of cotton I will appreciate it and will make good use of it.

With best wishes.

Very truly,

A. F. LEVER.

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., December 10, 1915.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LEVER: Absence from the office prevented an earlier reply to yours of November 25. I am pleased to learn that you had a conference with Secretary Redfield in regard to the gathering of foreign statistics of cotton consumption.

In compliance with your request, I furnish herewith the reasons why such statistics are necessary.

Any commodity takes current price valuation from the apparent volume of supply and the apparent extent of demand. These factors are influenced more or less by the prospect of increased or decreased supply and by the prospect of increasing or decreasing demand. But generally speaking, the price of the commodity depends upon the ratio of the available volume in existence to the calculated and demonstrated demand for the commodity before it can be supplemented by a new supply. It must appear to even the most casual analysis, therefore, that a knowledge of demand is as important as a knowledge of supply.

Applying this philosophy to the problem of cotton prices, every exhibit of prospective or real supply should be accompanied by an exhibit of real or prospective demand. For instance, it has been reasonably certain since last June, when the cotton acreage was definitely reported, that the Southern States this year would not furnish more than approximately 12,000,000 bales. The monthly reports of condition, following the publication of acreage, indicated a decrease in the maximum estimate based upon acreage, and the ginning reports from month to month have confirmed that decrease until at this moment it is definitely known that the crop can not exceed 11,250,000 bales. With somewhat less precision, but with fairly satisfactory information, we have learned that the foreign cotton supply of the world of 1915 has been reduced in about the same degree, so that the world supply of cotton for 1915 is fully 5,000,000 bales less than the world supply of 1914.

On the other hand, there has been no information from any official dependable and unselfish source as to the rate of consumption of cotton except in the United States, which consumes only a third to a fourth of the world's crop. In other words, we have a complete and dependable calculation of the supply side of the price equation, but we know only a fourth to a third of the facts concerning the demand side of the equation. It is mathematically and philosophically impossible to deduce a true result in economic value from such incomplete information. The value of cotton, therefore, is more or less speculative, though it is a commodity of world necessity, and with complete information as to demand as well as supply its value would be definite and clearly recognized by all parties at interest.

We constantly exhibit by Government publications from the time the crop is planted until the entire yield is accounted for every ascertainable fact concerning production. The mind of the whole trading world is thus fixed upon supply, and any trifling variation in real or prospective supply is the cause of undue fluctuations. An exceptional condition report during the growing season, or a variation of 5,000 bales from the expectation of a monthly ginning report, will influence the market a quarter of a cent to a cent. On the other hand, circumstances and facts of far greater consequence on the demand side of the equation are ignored. It should be apparent to any sane man that if a prospective increase of 500,000 bales in the supply should adversely influence prices a half cent a pound, a prospective increase of 500,000 bales in demand should exercise a favorable influence in the same degree.

A few great cotton traders manage to obtain more or less accurate information concerning demand, but the great mass of traders and the whole body of farmers are denied such information because they have not the facilities for gathering it, and the Government declines to gather it for them. We publish annually, along in January or February, cotton consumption for the preceding calendar year, but that information comes after the farmers have sold their cotton, and hence is of no value to them except as a hint in governing their planting for another year.

If acreage in June is an indication of yield, then spindle capacity is an indication of consumption and should be so reported at the same time and in the same connection that acreage is reported. If the condition of the plant from month to month is an indication of yield, then the condition of the cotton trade from month to month is an indication of the consumption and should be so reported at the same time and in the same connection. If the output of the gins from month to month is a measure of supply, then the consumption of the mills from month to month is a measure of demand, and should be so reported at the same time and in the same connection.

The point of my argument is that the same agencies and the same instrumentalities that are employed to exhibit real or prospective supply should be employed to exhibit real or prospective demand, so that spinners and producers alike would have presented to their minds in the same publication, or in periodical publications, the precise facts concerning both the factors. In this way and in this way only will the Government deal fairly with the producers and with the consumers.

I have no patience with the narrow view that the Government should not publish statistics of production. Before such statistics were published the producers were at the mercy of selfish interests that made estimates of production, and in so doing were consciously or unconsciously governed by their wishes. You will recall that 15 or 20 years ago such estimates were outrageously employed to "bear" the cotton market. The Government publications of production statistics have checked this evil, but they have left the producer at the disadvantage of having his supply accurately exhibited without giving him any intelligent idea of the demand for his product.

Coming now to the important matter of legislative and departmental action, I submit that it is comparatively easy for consular agents or for special agents of the Department of Commerce to gather accurate information month by month in all the cotton-milling districts of foreign countries. This is true, perhaps, as to all districts except the English spinning district, which is the largest and most important. There the spinners are well organized, and they are unwilling to give the information. In this case we must adopt the tactics which the spinners employed before our Government began to publish statistics of American production. That is, we must make the best estimates possible of the English rate of consumption. This can be done by intelligent men in the milling towns and the markets of Great Britain, who can ascertain in each milling town the fact whether the mills are running on full time or short time, and who can learn from merchants, both wholesale and retail, the comparative state of the cotton-goods trade. When we have made a faithful and persistent effort to get the truth through a series of months, I am confident that the spinners will recognize the importance in their own interest of giving us the precise facts.

As I explained to you in a former letter, this suggestion of procedure is based upon the advice of Mr. Gerald C. Dudgeon, the Director General of Agriculture in Egypt, whom I interviewed in 1913 with the hope of getting pressure from Egypt upon the British Government to require its cotton spinners to make monthly reports of consumption. Mr. Dudgeon explained that the spinning district of England is a sort of balance of power in British politics, and that no minister would exercise such compulsion for fear of offending this populous and powerful section. But Mr. Dudgeon ventured the confident prediction that if our consular agents or special agents would make diligent inquiry throughout the milling district, and if we would make known month by month the facts so ascertained the British spinners would soon come to terms. As I have also related to you, I believe, I received the same advice from Sir Charles McCara, of England, and Mr. Arthur Kuffler, of Austria, who were then leading spirits in the Federation of Master Cotton Spinners and who recognize the justice of our contention for information, but who are unable to persuade their fellow spinners to adopt the policy.

I entertain no doubt whatever that if the Department of Commerce and the Bureau of Markets will address their energies to the gathering and dissemination of information concerning demand, the whole trading world will soon come to a state of mind which will give due weight to demand, and thereby recognize the economic value of cotton. Such a state of mind will be a deterrent of speculative fluctuations and will be a considerable influence in persuading our farmers to adjust supply to well-ascertained demand.

I venture to add the thought that the dissemination of intelligence is the best service and the only safe service which the Government can render. This, I believe, is sound statesmanship. Anything more is dangerous paternalism. But I think I can foresee that if the Government is not careful to furnish intelligence it will soon be required by a heedless mass of people, following unwise leadership, to engage in marketing and financial adventures which may lead us into incalculable perils.

Yours, very truly, CLARENCE OUSLEY, Director.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hate to interrupt a thing of this sort, but if the gentleman from South Carolina is through I want to make a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. KING] may proceed for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. KING] may proceed for five minutes out of order—that is, not in accordance with the rules. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CAPT. JOHN ERICSSON.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, it is Sunday morning, March 9, 1862, in the city of Washington. Secretary of the Navy Gideon Welles is on his way home from the department. Suddenly he stops at St. John's Church in front of the White House. Commodore Smith, of the navy yard, who is attending divine services, is called out. The two are in conversation upon the walk. Welles is reading the contents of some late dispatches. The Merrimac, the "iron diadem of the South," the day before had come out of Norfolk and struck the U. S. frigate Cumberland below the starboard forechains. She had reeled, rolled, and gone down. The commander of the Congress, Commodore Smith's son Joe, was killed and its flag was struck. No man knows what the morrow will bring forth. Fear possesses the hearts of men. Gen. Wood from Fort Monroe is announcing that probably the Minnesota and St. Lawrence will be captured. He is admitting that if the Merrimac prepares to attack the fort it will be only a question of a few days when it must be abandoned. The Merrimac is about to raise the blockade and carry the Confederate flag in its disturbing journeyings into the harbors of the North. New York is frantically floating barges and rafts to prevent her passage, and Washington, by a thousand hands, is loading boats with stone to be sunk in the channel to prevent her passage when she shall on the morrow have destroyed her adversaries. The keepers of the house are trembling, and strong men are bowing themselves; stocks are falling 10 per cent an hour. Gold is rising with terrific speed. A panic is prevailing. President Lincoln's Cabinet is meeting. Stanton is talking. Listen. What is he saying?

The Merrimac will change the whole character of the war; she will destroy, one after another, every naval vessel; she will lay all the cities on the seaboard under contribution. I shall immediately recall Burnside. Port Royal must be abandoned. I will notify the governors and municipal authorities in the North to take instant measures to protect their harbors. I have no doubt that the monster is at this minute on her way to Washington, and—not unlikely we shall have a shell or a cannon ball from one of her guns in the White House before we leave the room.

Looking out of the window which commanded a view of the Potomac for many miles—

Mr. Seward is listening in sympathy. Depression is enthroned there. "Oh, ye of little faith," why do you not read the forgotten letter lying upon your table addressed to the President:

NEW YORK, August 29, 1861.

SIR: * * * Attachment to the Union alone impels me to offer my services—my life if need be—in the great cause which Providence has called upon you to perform. * * * I offer to construct a vessel for the destruction of the rebel fleet at Norfolk. * * * Please look carefully at the inclosed plans and you will find that the means I propose to employ are very simple.

At this very hour the author of that letter is in his home in Franklin Street, New York City. His vessel is built. It is on its way to-night along its tempestuous route. The morning of March 9, 1862, is breaking in Hampton Roads, and now the brave and gallant Lieut. Jones, in command of the Merrimac, gets under way to finish the Minnesota. But just a moment, Commander Jones. Yesterday, with ease, you demonstrated the further uselessness of wooden vessels in naval warfare, but to-day you fight one of the twelve decisive battles of the world and assist in revolutionizing the navies of the nations. A strange looking iron tower approaches. It had been seen the night before coming in under the light of the burning Congress. It does not reveal all that it is. It has within itself the genius of a giant of a man born in the forests of Vermland, Sweden, within six degrees of the Arctic Circle, and from whose streams and mountains no native ever yielded to a foreign master since Odin, with his Scythians, occupied the peninsula. A region of song, of legend, and of romance, and, during the Middle Ages, the home of the Swedish Robin Hoods; a man whose ability at 13 years allowed him to make a drawing for the construction of a canal in his native land; an officer in the Swedish Army; a trained gunner in the artillery, and before he was 14 years old commanding 600 Swedish troops in the construction of the canal; an expert marksman; an athlete; a surveyor; a draftsman for Bernadotte, Napoleon's King of Sweden; the inventor of the steam fire engine; a competitor with George Stephenson, of England, in the construction of locomotives; the originator of the idea of putting the machinery of war vessels below the water line; the artificial draft for locomotives; the inventor of the submerged propeller; the first one to use hoops to remedy the transverse weakness of guns; a man with 30 patents in England and over 100 in the United States; a naturalized citizen; a man who had known adversity and overcome obstacles, who loved song and poetry and withal imbued by a great love of his adopted country, and an ardent believer in the Union cause; one whose iron hand has traced every one of the hundred drawings of the mysterious object now approaching you, Lieut. Jones. The Monitor is the climax of years of study and experience concentrated into a single idea and with a single purpose. Lieut. Jones, unafraid, dashes the Merrimac at its threatening foe, but she is cumbersome and unwieldly, while the light draft of the Monitor permits her to move about the Merrimac. The Monitor now takes a position where the Merrimac can not bring her guns to bear upon her. The Merrimac in preparing for a broadside has lost 15 minutes, while the Monitor, like a top, whirls around and about her. Now her turret turns, and the guns fire at her antagonist, and then the turret revolves and the guns are not seen until she is ready to fire again. Four hours have gone by and no great damage to either. The Monitor is making for the Merrimac's rudder and propeller. The Merrimac now rams the Monitor with great force, but she slides away without harm. Jones now determines to board the Monitor, commanded by Lieut. Worden, and to choke her funnel and lash her to the Merrimac, but the Monitor moves to shallow water and is safe.

The Monitor is struck 22 times without particular injury. The Merrimac goes into dry dock with 97 indentations, 20 of which were made by the 11-inch guns of the Monitor. Her mapped-out career, first to capture Washington, next to levy tribute on New York, and, after raising the southern blockade, excel the record of the Alabama, is curtailed. It is demonstrated that the North has a new engine of warfare, which is invulnerable when attacked and forceful in the offensive, and that Capt. John Ericsson bears "one of the few, the immortal names, that are not born to die." [Applause.]

John Ericsson was born July 31, 1803, in Vermland, Sweden, in the mining district of Nordmark, where his father, Olaf Ericsson, was a mine inspector. His ancestors were miners as far back as the seventeenth century. In 1799 his father married Brita Sophia Engström, who was of the same age as himself, 21. Her family was of Flemish origin, and her grandfather was married to a woman of Scottish descent, thus introducing a strain of Caledonian blood into the veins of the great inventor. His mother is described as "a warm-hearted, intellectual, high-spirited woman of cheerful disposition and active habits, very handsome, tall and slender in figure, with magnificent light-blue eyes that deepened in color, sparkled and flashed most brilliantly when she was animated." She was greatly interested in philosophical, social, religious, and political matters, and fond of fiction and poetry, Walter Scott being her favorite author.

John Ericsson as a boy was of an industrious disposition, and during the days and far into the nights could be found drawing, planning, and constructing. He took great interest in the machinery at the mines where his father was an inspector. Among his playthings as a boy were found circles, lines, squares, and curves, and a great variety of mechanical drawings, principally referring to the mines.

His father was bankrupted by the war of 1811–1814, and John, with the whole family, was brought face to face with the real hardships of life. During those years the family lived at the sawmill at Edlet, where his father had charge of selecting timber for the Gota Canal being constructed at that time. The father, however, took great interest in the education of his sons, John and Nils. They were taught mechanical drawing, and later both of the brothers were appointed cadets in the Mechanical Corps of the Swedish Navy. In this capacity John was permitted to make plans for the construction of certain parts of the canal, and at 13 he was assistant leveler at the station of Riddarhagen.

In 1820 John entered the Swedish Army. From a German field officer he learned surveying and from the English controller of the works he learned English. Not only was he by nature equipped for his life work, but his early educational advantages were along the line of his development. At 9 years of age he constructed a sawmill and a pump, his sole tools being a jackknife and a gimlet. At 10 years of age he constructed a pump for drawing the water out of the mines by the aid of a windmill. In those days it was considered proper to have the drawings in color, and, being without the necessary brush, he drew the hairs for one of his own construction from his mother's sable coat. Before he was 14 years of age he commanded 600 Swedish troops then laboring in the construction of the canal.

His active nature rebelled against a further conservative course, and, imbued with an ambition and fired by the successes of the Corsican, he entered the army determined upon a military career. He was assigned, with the rank of ensign, to the Twenty-third Regiment, Rifle Corps. In this capacity he became an expert marksman. He developed into an athlete with twice the strength of an ordinary man, lifting with ease when 18 years of age a cannon weighing 600 pounds. He made a special study of the science of artillery. He was soon promoted to the rank of second lieutenant, and shortly afterwards attracted the attention of Bernadotte, then on the throne of Sweden, who summoned him to the royal palace to construct maps illustrating the campaigns of the marshal of the Empire.

On May 18, 1826, he arrived in England. On August 3, 1827, he was commissioned a captain in the Swedish Army, but resigned the same day; he was always thereafter, however, known as Capt. John Ericsson. In England he soon established a business relation with Mr. Braithwaite, under the firm name of Braithwaite & Ericsson. From this firm proceeded numerous valuable and important inventions. Ericsson was the first man to suggest putting the machinery of a vessel below water line to protect it against shot.

In 1828 he invented the steam fire engine, practically in the same general form and on the same principles as those operated to-day upon our streets, to the delight of every boy, whether he be old or young. He competed in the building of steam locomotives with George Stevenson in England. He originated the artificial draft to increase the heat in the furnace as the blacksmith does his forge with his bellows. Without this invention the locomotive which traverses our country would be an impossibility.

On October 15, 1836, at the age of 33, he married Amelia Byan, aged 19, at St. John's Church, Paddington, England. As early as 1833 he was experimenting with submerged propellers on the London & Birmingham Canal, and it is conceded by all authorities that to John Ericsson belongs the credit of having designed a screw propeller which has changed very little during the years from its original design.

In 1837 he designed an engine for imparting motion directly to the screw propeller shaft, being the first one ever built. The same obstinacy and narrowmindedness which pervades bureaucracies to-day seemed to be in existence in Ericsson's time, and as a matter of fact kept him in a continual contest during his life for the maintenance of his ideas. The lords of the British Admiralty refused to consider his screw propeller, because "even if it had power to propel the vessel, it would be found altogether useless in practice because, the power being applied in the stern, it would be absolutely impossible to make the vessel steer."

On November 1, 1839, at the request of Robert F. Stockton, of the United States, he resigned his position as superintendent of the Eastern Counties Railroad, of England, and left for New York City, in the United States, at which place he arrived November 23, 1839. In the Navy Department of the United States he found the same obstinacy which he had encountered in England, and the department claimed that the introduction of steam vessels into the Navy would be impracticable, as steam could only be used for the purpose of transportation on land. Nevertheless Ericsson planned, and the Government adopted in 1842, a steam war vessel, known as the Princeton, which went into commission on February 4 of that year.

When he arrived in New York he took up his home at the Astor House. He is described as a man who was very careful of his personal appearance and exceptional in dress. He wore a close-fitting black frock surtout coat, well open at the front, with rolling collar showing a velvet vest and good display of shirt front. A fine gold chain hung around his neck, looped at the first buttonhole of the vest, and attached to a watch carried with a fob in the vest. He usually wore well-fitting light colored trousers, light colored kid gloves, and a beaver hat. He had a well-built, military figure, about 5 feet 10½ inches in height, and was well set up, with broad shoulders. He had impressive blue eyes, brown curly hair, and fair complexion. His head was of medium size, his mouth well cut, upper lip a little drawn. The large, firm-set jaw conveyed an impression of firmness and individual character.

Later he moved to 95 Franklin Square, where he lived for more than 20 years.

He was a successful gunmaker, one of his first guns being fired 300 times, with charges varying from 25 to 35 pounds of powder and 212 pounds of shot. This gun is now on exhibition at one of the Government yards. It was fired 150 times before going aboard the Princeton, and sighted by its designer, the former Swedish artillerist; and so sighted, it pierced a target of 4½ inches in wrought iron.

He was the inventor of an instrument for measuring distances in firing guns. The Princeton served all through the Mexican War and, finally, without ever being worn out, was condemned by the United States Navy Department.

Ericsson was a man of great charity, kind heart, and strict integrity. In the latter years of his life he spent a large part of his income in assisting worthy persons and enterprises, but he was always careful in his donations that he was not imposed upon.

Ericsson was naturalized on October 28, 1848, and never again during his life returned to his native land.

It is interesting to note that he patented a fluid meter for measuring the flow of water, used by the Croton Aqueduct. He was the father of the submarine gun. The coming of the Civil War roused him. Above all things, he was a patriot.

In 1857 he had offered the Monitor to Napoleon the Third, but the offer had been rejected. In 1861 his model was taken out of the dust-covered box and sent to Washington for an examination by the Naval Board. It excited great curiosity. All were surprised at the novelty of it; some advised trying it; others ridiculed it; and the conference was finally closed for the first day by Mr. Lincoln remarking, "All I have to say is what the girl said when she stuck her foot into the stocking—'It strikes me there is something in it.'"

Secretary of the Navy Mallory, of the Southern Confederacy, first suggested the ironclad to the South, and they were well upon their way in building and constructing the Merrimac before the presentation of the Monitor was made to the authorities at Washington. Mallory had been Ericsson's friend in the years gone by when he was a Member of Congress from his State, and when he no doubt learned of the value of the ironclad ships from Ericsson himself.

Ericsson finally obtained a contract from the Government to build the Monitor, and before the contract was completed the keel plate had already passed through the rollers of the mill. The department was so afraid of public criticism that they inserted a clause in the contract requiring a refunding of the money paid in case the Monitor should not prove to be impregnable to shot. This very antagonistic clause was in a measure resented by Ericsson, but did not prevent him from going on with the work of completion, and, in fact, it was engaged in battle with the Merrimac before the last payment was made by the Government. The keel of the Monitor was laid October 25, 1861, the steam put in the engines December 30, 1861; it was launched January 30, 1862, completed February 15, 1862, made its first trip February 19, 1862, and put into commission February 25, 1862, under command of John L. Worden, United States Navy. March 4, 1862, she tried her guns; March 8 she made her trip to Hampton Roads, and on the 9th she fought the Merrimac. Every line of this ship was drawn and laid down by John Ericsson in over 100 drawings. There were over 40 patentable contrivances on the Monitor for which he refused to claim patents.

You assume correctly—

he wrote to Mr. G. V. Fox on October 5, 1875—

that the plan of the Monitor was based on the observation of the behavior of timber in our great Swedish lakes. I found that while the raftsman in his elevated cabin experienced very little motion, the seas breaking over his nearly submerged craft, these seas at the same time worked the sailing vessels nearly on their beam ends.

Not only was the Monitor a success in clearing Hampton Roads, but it became the forerunner in the production of an entire fleet of war vessels built upon a new system, and successful for the purposes intended, without expending a single dollar on preliminary experiments. It was originally intended to send the Monitor to New Orleans, but this plan was changed. She left New York Harbor March 6, 1862, with a crew in which, as it happened, the Norse element predominated. Ericsson built her, Dahlgren armed her, and Worden fought her.

On March 28, 1862, the Thirty-seventh Congress, during its second session, passed this joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is fitting and proper that a public acknowledgment be made to Capt. John Ericsson for the enterprise, skill, energy, and forecast displayed by him in the construction of his iron-clad boat, the Monitor, which under gallant and able management came so opportunely to the rescue of our fleet in Hampton Roads, and perchance of all our coast defenses near, in arresting the work of destruction then being successfully prosecuted by the enemy with their iron-clad steamers seemingly irresistible by any other power at our command—and that the thanks of Congress are hereby presented to him for the great service which he has thus rendered the country.

For many years, and until the day of his death on March 8, 1889, Capt. John Ericsson lived and resided in the city of New York, always industrious, and originating and inventing many new and useful improvements during that period of his life. He performed the necessary preliminary work, paving the way for Edison, who could not have succeeded as rapidly but for the foundation laid by his predecessor.

At the request of the Swedish Government his body was borne across the Atlantic in the U. S. S. Baltimore, and amid great manifestations of sorrow arrived at Filipstad, in Vermland, where by 12 miners it was carried into the church where services were performed; and on September 15, 1890, in the morning, the coffin was deposited in a chapel specially prepared.

Few men have rendered greater services to humanity and none have rendered more to their country than John Ericsson. His ashes lie in his native land of Sweden, but his memory is ever held in grateful and undying remembrance by the country of his adoption. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the broad language of the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, the act of February 14, 1903, which language is to be found in section 3:

That it shall be the province and duty of said department to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce, the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishing industries, the labor interests, and the transportation facilities of the United States—

And so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow the Chair to ask him a question there?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is aware that under the rules of the House jurisdiction of appropriations is carried to different committees of the House, and the Committee on Appropriations itself has several appropriation bills that it brings in, dealing with various governmental activities. One of those bills, the sundry civil appropriation bill, deals with the general expenses of the Government. The bill before the House is the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, which carries salaries for the officers and employees of the Government. The Chair would like to have the gentleman, in discussing the proposition that the Chair thought he would discuss, from the law he cited, consider the question whether an appropriation pertaining to any of these matters authorized by law would be in order on the bill carrying legislative, executive, and judicial appropriations.

Mr. LEVER. As I understand it, the legislative appropriation bill not only carries what the Chair has stated, but in this very bill carries authorizations and extensions even beyond the authority of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LEVER. There is no question about that. It seems to me that the point for the Chair to decide is whether or not the amendment setting aside $25,000 of the appropriation carried for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for certain purposes is, in the first place, in order under the general rule that there shall not be legislation on an appropriation bill. That is the first proposition, and to that I would like to address myself briefly; and then I will discuss the other point as I go along.

The Chair will observe that the language which I have read is extremely broad, and permits the Department of Commerce and Labor—now the Department of Commerce—to do anything that we believe will foster, promote, or develop the foreign and domestic commerce of this country.

The amendment which I have offered is in form the same amendment as that which the gentleman from Texas offered, and undertakes to furnish information to the people of the United States who are engaged in producing things that go into foreign commerce; and, in the second place, furnishing information to people who are actually engaged in foreign commerce; and, in the third place, furnishing information to those who are engaged in the manufacture of things that go into foreign commerce.

I think the Chair will agree that one of the greatest assistances that can be rendered in any business or any occupation is the assistance that comes through information, and this is what we are seeking to provide in this amendment, the furnishing of facts, figures, and statistics that will enable the people of the United States the better to market the products of the farm and the factory which go into foreign commerce.

Now, again, I wish to call the attention of the Chair especially——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Because I drew that language.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to be well and broadly drawn.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. Does the gentleman think that general language of that kind authorizes an appropriation for a specific purpose?

Mr. LEVER. My judgment is that this language, broad as it is, would authorize an appropriation for any purpose that did not in the first place limit the authority of the head of this department, or in the second place that falls within the general scope of the language of the act.

Mr. MANN. That would require the Chair, then, to determine whether, in his opinion, the investigation proposed would foster, promote, or develop industries. That would be a matter of opinion. The gentleman will find, I think, in the same law, that it provides that the Department of Commerce shall gather and compile and publish information.

Mr. LEVER. I was just about to read that section to the Chair.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that would authorize an appropriation for the gathering of specific information?

Mr. LEVER. I should like to ask the gentleman why not?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it has never been held that way anywhere in any of the provisions creating the departments. Of course, I know we have gone the limit on the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. I was just about to call the gentleman's attention to that——

Mr. MANN. But there is quite an easy differentiation between the two. We might say in an act that the Government shall do useful things for the citizens of the United States; but that would not authorize a specific appropriation which, in the opinion of some gentlemen, would be a useful thing for the citizens of the United States. Those terms have never in my experience been considered as authority for specific appropriations for specific acts. Otherwise no one would ever dare use general terms.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to the language in section 5, to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred.

That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the bureau of manufactures.

The Bureau of Manufactures has been merged into the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and the functions of that bureau are now being performed by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think the gentleman will admit that the Bureau of Manufactures was abolished, that the section to which he refers was repealed—although I am not certain of that—and new language creating the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was inserted, either in the sundry civil bill or the deficiency bill a few years ago.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; but I will call the attention of the gentleman to this language in the act:

And the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby given the power and authority to rearrange the statistical work of the bureaus and offices confided to said department and to consolidate any of the statistical bureaus and offices transferred to said department; and said Secretary shall also have authority to call upon other departments of the Government for statistical data and results obtained by them.

And so on.

I take it that the fundamental law gave them the right to make a rearrangement or consolidation.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that it was not done under that act at all; that the change was made several years ago by an amendment in the House on one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. LEVER. At any rate, the gentleman from Illinois will concede, and I think the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill will concede, that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is now performing the functions that before its organization was performed by the Bureau of Manufactures.

Now, the law that I desire to call the Chair's attention to reads:

It shall be the province and duty of said bureau, under the direction of the Secretary, to foster, promote, and develop the various manufacturing industries of the United States, and markets for the same at home and abroad—

I direct the Chair's particular attention to that—"and markets for the same at home and abroad"— domestic and foreign, by gathering, compiling, publishing, and supplying all available and useful information concerning such industries and such markets, and by such other methods and means as may be prescribed by the Secretary or provided by law.

It seems to me in that language the statute confers certain powers upon the Department of Commerce, that this amendment which we are proposing in no way infringes on that power and in nowise extends that power, and under the general rule this amendment would be in order.

Now, as to the point of the gentleman from Illinois, as to whether or not we have the authority to specify under general language that certain things shall be done or certain things shall not be done. I call the Chair's attention to what we do on the floor of this House in the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill every year. The fundamental law creating the Department of Agriculture is drawn very much in the language creating the Department of Commerce and Labor. It is no broader and not much narrower, and yet from time to time, if we can show that an appropriation is for the purpose of acquiring or diffusing information on agricultural subjects, that amendment or that proposition is in order under the rule and is made in order by the fundamental law creating the Department of Agriculture.

I see no reason why the Chair should hold, or why the gentleman from Illinois should claim, that one rule should apply to the appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture and another rule apply to the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. It has been my understanding of the rule, Mr. Chairman, that if the fundamental law was broad enough to permit these things to be done, then it could be done under the rule, and I believe the amendment is fully in order. It is certainly germane to this proposition and, it seems to me, falls within the broad language creating this department. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order. It undertakes to restrict the power of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. Here is a proposition in the bill providing for certain general duties to be performed by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. The gentleman from South Carolina seeks to restrict the power, in so far as the performance of its duties is concerned, under the appropriation. It seems to me that it is legislation in that it undertakes to restrict and change the duties for the bureau and to deprive the bureau of its discretion in performance of its duties. Then, it is not germane to this paragraph. The amendment provides for the collection of statistics relating to cotton in foreign countries, and provides that $25,000 of the appropriation for the general promotion or development of foreign commerce shall be used for that purpose. I do not believe that, for either one of these reasons, the amendment is in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, supplementing what the chairman has called attention to, I wish to emphasize the fact that in section 5 of the act creating the department, which both the proponent of the amendment and the chairman of the committee has referred to, the Secretary of Commerce is authorized to compile and publish all available and useful information. That is a broad term, much broader than the purport of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from South Carolina. He is providing a direction that the law shall be changed, or rather the discretion lodged in the Secretary of Commerce shall be interfered with by collecting a certain kind of information, namely, statistics. There are decisions, and many of them, which hold that where a law authorizes a department head to perform certain work in a certain way, that any amendment, even in the form of a limitation, is subject to a point of order. It is acknowledged, accepting the position of the gentleman from South Carolina, that he has full authority to collect available, useful information, and that it rests with him to determine the manner in which it should be done. It is not within the power of any amendment to restrict that discretion, and in restricting that discretion you change the fundamental law, and that is what this amendment does when you provide that statistics shall be collected. That is a particular restriction on the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Is it not a fact that the amendment does nothing more than undertake to point out to the Secretary the desire of Congress that the information to which the gentleman has referred shall be of a particular kind, namely, cotton, and it does not in any way restrict the power or authority of the Secretary of Commerce to gather information to which the gentleman called attention?

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to the gentleman, it is clear that the amendment seeks to restrict the discretion and authority of the Secretary of Commerce as vested in him at the present time under the fundamental law. You restrict him to the collection of statistics, whereas he has a broader authority to obtain information by such means as he determines, not by statistics, but by any method he determines, and to that end you are restricting his discretion and the authority vested in him by law. There are numerous decisions which hold that when an amendment attempts to control the discretion vested in him it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the word "information" used in section 5 is a broad term. Mr. Chairman, "statistics" is the lesser term within the broader term. We are asking in this amendment that a certain amount of this money shall be used for the purpose of collecting statistics within the narrower meaning of the word "information." It leaves available, of course, sufficient money to collect the other information to which the gentleman calls attention, and likewise leaves available all the authority and power that the Secretary of the Department of Commerce now has under the fundamental act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of opinion that the paragraph providing for the taking of these various statistics, being in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, is out of order. Being out of order, the question arises whether, having been allowed to remain in the bill, it can be amended by inserting new matter. As the Chair has several times to-day ruled, under the practice of the House under these conditions the provision of the bill could be further amended by germane amendments.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit me to interrupt there for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Is the Chair familiar with the fact that these provisions have always been carried in the legislative bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not aware of that fact.

Mr. MANN. That is the fact. All of these items are old items in the bill. They have always been carried in the legislative bill, and never have been carried in the sundry civil bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not know that, and the Chair thanks the gentleman for calling his attention to it. The Chair was under the impression that those items had been carried in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Would it make any difference as to the point of order if these items were carried in this bill or in the sundry civil appropriation bill? I am not sure if the item ought to be in the sundry civil bill, whether it is in order to carry it in this bill. That is what I presume the Chair is arguing about in his own mind.

Mr. MANN. I think the ruling has always been that where the Committee on Appropriations having jurisdiction possibly to include a matter in either one of several bills has included it in one bill, and it has remained there, it is not for anyone else to challenge the propriety of having that item in that particular bill.

Mr. LEVER. I am familiar, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], of course, is familiar, with the fact that if an item be subject to a point of order, the fact of it having been carried in a bill from time to time does not affect the point of order, but this is a different proposition.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly it would not make any difference to a point of order that it is not authorized by law, but I think myself that that is a determining factor as to whether this is in the correct bill. It has always been carried in this bill and it never has been in any other bill.

Mr. LEVER. That may be true, and yet the Committee on Appropriations is not beyond making a mistake occasionally.

Mr. MANN. That might be so. The items were carried in this bill before the Bureau of Domestic Commerce was created, and it was created upon an item in this bill. I said awhile ago that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce was created upon an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill, but I was in error about that. It was on the legislative bill, taking the place of the old provision respecting the Bureau of Manufactures. I merely call it to the attention of the Chair because I think it likely it might make a difference, and certainly the Chair is entitled to the information.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. I really have no information about the point at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appreciates the gentlemen's calling his attention to the proposition. The Chair was in error. The Chair is frank to say that he believed that this proposition was carried in the sundry civil appropriation bill; but that fact is not going to change the effect of the ruling of the Chair. It does affect one of the reasons the Chair might have given for his ruling. The ruling, however, will be the same as it would have been had this matter not been called to the attention of the Chair. The Chair, therefore, must consider whether the amendment is germane to the section of the bill and whether it is obnoxious to the point of order that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. The provision of the bill appropriates $125,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, for the purpose named in the bill. The amendment in question seeks to limit and control and interfere with executive discretion by providing that $25,000 of the amount shall be used for the specific purpose denominated in the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will permit—I do not know whether it makes any difference in the ruling—but the amendment, the Chair will notice, uses the word "may" instead of the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that changes the proposition. The Chair thinks it interferes with that legislative discretion vested by law in the Secretary of Commerce, and to that extent changes existing law; and the Chair, while in thorough sympathy with the amendment, feels constrained to sustain the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Investigating cost of production: For salaries and all other actual necessary expenses, including field investigations at home and abroad, compensation of experts, special agents, to be employed in Washington, D. C., or in the field, rental of quarters outside of the District of Columbia, when required, purchase of books of reference, manuscripts, and periodicals, to enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to ascertain at as early a date as possible, and whenever industrial changes shall make it essential, the cost of producing articles at the time dutiable in the United States, in leading countries where such articles are produced, by fully specified units of production, and under a classification showing the different elements of cost, of such articles of production, including the wages paid in such industries per day, week, month, or year, or by the piece; and hours employed per day; and the profits of manufacturers and producers of such articles; and the comparative cost of living and the kind of living; what articles are controlled by trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor, and what effect said trusts or other combinations of capital, business operations, or labor have on production and prices, $50,000.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of correcting a statement I made yesterday, during a discussion, respecting the climate of the city of Boise.

Mr. STAFFORD. Only one statement?

Mr. BENNET. Only one statement. I was misled by a gentleman with whom I was talking at the moment as to the climate of Boise. If I had given the subject thought, I would have realized that I was getting incorrect information. I know something about the climate of Boise myself. It is a good deal like the climate of southern California, and I take this early opportunity to say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and other gentlemen were entirely correct in their statement that there was need for the railroad to lead up to the lake for a summer resort. I said the climate there never got any warmer than 20 degrees below zero. That is a gross libel upon the State of Idaho, and it simply goes to illustrate the fact that one should not rely upon information loosely obtained from Members of Congress on the floor, who know nothing of the subject themselves. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McCRACKEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to thank the gentleman from New York for the correction which he has made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Promoting commerce, South and Central America: To further promote and develop the commerce of the United States with South and Central America, including the employment of experts and special agents in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, purchase of books of reference and periodicals, reports, traveling and subsistence expenses of officers and employees, and all other necessary incidental expenses not included in the foregoing, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, $100,000.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the committee on the subject of the national defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana.

MAYORS FAVOR NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, We have received the report of the House Committee on Military Affairs for increasing the efficiency of the Military Establishment, and following this Army bill ere long we will have under advisement the program for increasing our Navy from the Committee on Naval Affairs. Since we are entering upon this great question of preparedness so ably advocated by President Wilson and by a great body of my colleagues within the Hall of the House at the present time, I regard it appropriate to call attention to action taken by the National Defense Conference of Mayors of the United States at St. Louis, Mo., last Saturday, wherein it was strongly advocated that this country strengthen its Army and naval forces.

Mayors of most of the prominent cities of the country were present, and I have noted with extreme satisfaction that Mayor Benjamin Bosse, of Evansville, the leading city in the first congressional district of Indiana, which I represent, was present.

I wish to particularly call attention to the recommendation of the mayors that all arsenals, ordnance, rifle, and other munition-producing plants supported by Federal appropriation be located at a distance from the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and from the Canadian and Mexican borders, for it substantiates my own contention all along in connection with my advocacy of the establishment of an armor-plate factory at Evansville. I have always believed that Government factories of this character should be established at points as nearly equally distant between the Pacific and Atlantic seaboards as possible, and at the same time as nearly equally distant between the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, thereby being sufficiently removed from all points of possible invasion of a foreign enemy to make it practically certain the supply of the producing plant could not be cut off.

Evansville offers just this advantage, and is particularly fortunate by its situation on the great Ohio River and having a direct outlet to the Gulf of Mexico. At a later date we will probably take up this question of establishing an armor-plate factory, and as it is essential that a factory of this kind be located in a city of large population, with a large labor market to draw from, I expect to be able to show the many great advantages enjoyed by Evansville as a happy solution of the question of location.

I herewith submit to you the resolutions adopted by the mayors at St. Louis:

Whereas the purpose of the establishment of the Republic was, among other things, to provide for the common defense and thereby to secure to ourselves the blessings of liberty and peace; and

Whereas this Nation is to-day without adequate defense by sea or land and is almost wholly without the means to protect its territory, defend its people, or safeguard its institutions against possible aggression; and

Whereas for the common national defense there are required a mobilization of the organized physical resources of the Nation, an adequate Navy, ample coast defenses, a mobile Army; and

Whereas the General Board of the Navy has reported to the Secretary of the Navy that "our present Navy is not sufficient to give due weight to the diplomatic remonstrance of the United States in peace nor to enforce the policies in war"; and

Whereas we believe that the Navy should be increased with all speed until we shall have become the first naval power in the world, with strength on the Atlantic equal to that of any other power on that ocean and with additional strength upon the Pacific such as to make of us the first naval power upon that ocean; and

Whereas the General Staff of the Army has submitted to the War Department a plan for a moderate increase of the Regular Army, and for the organization, distribution, and equipment thereof, and for the increase and complete manning of coast defenses: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the mayors and members of mayors' committees on national defense of the cities of the United States, in convention assembled, do hereby demand the immediate authorization by Congress of the building program of the General Board of the Navy of July 30, 1915, together with such additions and modifications as their expert knowledge and experience may indicate to be necessary at this time. And we do further demand that the personnel of the Navy be increased in conformity with the requirements of the service as interpreted by the General Board; and be it further

Resolved, That we demand the increase and complete manning of coast defenses as recommended by the General Staff; and be it further

Resolved, That we demand the immediate increase, organization, and disposition of the Regular Army as recommended by the General Staff; and be it further

Resolved, That, recognizing the military obligation equally with the civic obligation as a fundamental duty of democratic citizenship in a Republic and to establish a system which will affect alike every man in the country, we approve and recommend the adoption of universal military training under Federal control throughout the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That we approve and recommend the immediate formulation of plans by the Federal Government for the organization and mobilization of the physical resources of the country; and to that end, among other things, we specifically recommend:

1. That all arsenals, ordnance, rifle, and other munition-producing plants supported by Federal appropriation be located at a distance from the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards and from the Canadian and Mexican borders, as recommended in the recent report of the General Staff of the Army.

2. That steps be taken by the Federal Government to effect in time of peace a standardization of all material which may be required by the Government in time of war.

3. That the transportation facilities, industries, and general resources of the country be so marshaled and organized as to make them promptly available for service upon the outbreak of war.

4. That Federal legislation to effectuate the foregoing be enacted by the present Congress.

And be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be at once transmitted to the Senate and to the House of Representatives and that a copy thereof be transmitted at once to each Senator and Representative in the National Congress.

J. G. Woodward, chairman, mayor of Atlanta, Ga.; John Purroy Mitchell, mayor of the city of New York; Lewis Fisher, mayor of Galveston, Tex.; Harold W. Newman, representing the mayor of New Orleans, La.; Willet M. Spooner, representing the mayor of Milwaukee, Wis.; Ira E. Wight, representing the mayor of St. Louis, Mo.; Wesley King, representing the mayor of Salt Lake City, Utah; J. A. C. Kennedy, representing the mayor of Omaha, Nebr.; Henry Harmon Chamberlin, representing the mayor of Worcester, Mass.; John W. Thomas, representing the mayor of Chicago.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LIEB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday there was some debate with reference to a proposition for the Department of Justice to lease a proposed new building. Some facts were elicited at that time, and some incidents which have occurred recently have attracted my attention to the manner in which Congress is providing buildings for the different executive departments of the Government.

It seems to me that Congress is pursuing a very shortsighted policy with reference to this matter. Every department is now renting numerous buildings, and in a great many cases the Government is paying a very high rate of rent upon the investment.

Seven of the executive departments have buildings designed for their use which are owned by the Government, but not one of these seven have a Government-owned building that is equal to the needs of the department. The other three executive departments do not occupy Government-owned buildings, but each of them rent numerous buildings for offices for the employees of their several departments.

This system must create a tendency to very great inefficiency in departmental management. With these several departments broken up into fragments, and these fragments located in different parts of this city, must tend to prevent any systematic arrangement and conduct of the affairs of the department.

What purpose can Congress have in pursuing this plan any longer? My main purpose in calling attention of Members to the situation is to satisfy them that the present plan is not only expensive but also prevents efficiency, and nobody is to blame for it but Congress.

The Government now rents all the buildings occupied by the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor. One building occupied by the Department of Justice is valued at $140,000, and the Government pays $12,400 rent for the building, making a net income to the owner of 7 per cent. The Post Office Department rents a building valued at $300,000 and pays a rent of $32,000, or a net return of 8¾ per cent. Another building is rented by the Government for the Quartermaster Corps, valued at $40,000, and pays a rental of $4,938, or a net return of 11 per cent. The Interstate Commerce offices are valued at $460,000, and the Government pays a rent of $39,024, a net return of 6½ per cent.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. GOOD. The valuations that are spoken of by the gentleman, are they the assessed values or the actual values?

Mr. STERLING. The actual value. I am giving the actual value as stated by the Journal of the American Institute of Architects, a copy of which I hold in my hand. This publication, however, gives the assessed value also, but I am not reading that. This journal is, in my opinion, the best authority attainable on these valuations.

Another instance is found in the Navy Department, which rents offices valued at $285,000; the Government pays a rental that returns to the owner 12 per cent net. The Department of Agriculture rents for the Bureau of Chemistry a building valued at $148,000 and pays the owner a net return of 9 per cent. Another office rented by the Department of Agriculture pays a net return of 9¼ per cent. Another office building rented by that department pays a net return of 8¾ per cent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. How does the gentleman arrive at the net per cent? Is that given in the publication which the gentleman has?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it is given here. I want to say to the Members that I am assuming the facts given in this publication to be correct, and I have not any doubt that they are correct. The rental paid by the Government for all of these various buildings pays a net return to the owners of from 4 to 15 per cent. Of course, some of these are very reasonable; but it seems to me it is a gross extravagance for this Government to pay rental upon property that will net a return of from 10 to 15 per cent, or even 6 per cent. I dare say that money to the Government is not worth more than 3 per cent. The Government already owns numerous very appropriate sites for public buildings that under our present plan are paying the Government nothing. We ought to realize some income from these sites. It seems to me that it would be a matter of economy to utilize them rather than pay a very high rental on extremely high-priced sites.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I will.

Mr. SEARS. Are all the buildings upon which the Government is paying rent included in the publication which the gentleman holds?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think all buildings are included in this paper. It is not a complete itemized statement of all the buildings rented, but there is here a recapitulation of total rents paid by each department.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman include that in his statement?

Mr. STERLING. I will include that in my statement. At the risk of repetition let me state the facts a little more fully, so that they may be better understood.

The Department of Justice is renting a building on K Street for its principal offices, valued at $140,000, for which it pays an annual rental of $12,400, making a net return to the owner of 7 per cent on the valuation.

The Post Office Department is renting a building at First and K Streets valued at $300,000, for which it pays an annual rental of $32,000, making a net return to the owner of 8¾ per cent.

The Department of Commerce rents the main building which it occupies, situated on Pennsylvania Avenue, valued at $666,000, for which it pays an annual rental of $65,500, making a net return to the owners of 7¾ per cent.

The Quartermaster Corps occupies a building at Eckington Place valued at $40,500, for which it pays a rental of $4,938 a year, making a net return to the owner of 11 per cent on the valuation.

The Navy Department occupies a building on New York Avenue valued at $190,000, for which it pays an annual rental of $40,000, making a net return of 12 per cent to the owner.

The Treasury Department occupies a building on New York Avenue valued at $24,000, for which the Government pays an annual rental of $1,250, making a net return of 7 per cent to the owner.

The Department of Agriculture houses the Bureau of Chemistry in a building on Thirteenth Street valued at $148,000, and the Government pays an annual rental of $16,000, making a net return of 9 per cent to the owner.

The Department of Agriculture has some of its offices located in a building on Fourteenth Street, valued at $180,000, for which the Government pays a rental of $20,000 per year, making to the owner a net return of 9¼ per cent.

The same department has its Bureau of Plant Industry located on Fourteenth Street in a building valued at $28,000, for which a rent is paid at the rate of $3,000 per year, making a net return to the owners of 8¾ per cent.

The same department occupies a building at Linwood Place, valued at $46,274, for which it pays a rental of $5,400 per year, which makes a net return to the owners of 9¼ per cent. That department occupies another building on Pennsylvania Avenue, valued at $45,700. The annual rental is $4,800, making a net return of 8½ per cent. It rents another building on B Street, valued at $19,000, for which it pays a rental of $3,000, making a net return to the owners of 15 per cent.

The Forest Service of this department occupies an old building on E Street, for which it pays to the owners a net return of 9⅜ per cent on the investment. Another on Twelfth Street for which it pays to the owners a net return of 10¼ per cent on the investment, and another at Linworth Place for which it pays to the owners a net return of 14 per cent.

The Department of Justice rents a building on Fifteenth Street, valued at $11,800, for which it pays a rental of $1,800 per year, making a net return to the owner of 13¼ per cent.

These are only a part of the buildings which the Government rents for Government purposes. Some of the other buildings occupied by the Government do not pay so high a rental as these I have stated, but there are other cases not cited by me where the different departments pay rent which amount to a net return to the owners from 7 per cent to 12 per cent on the actual value of the property.

This policy does not tend to economy, to efficiency, nor to respectability.

As an illustration of what Congress has done in the past I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that some 14 years ago Congress made an appropriation for a new building for the Department of Agriculture. The appropriation was not at all adequate for the purposes of that department. It only built a half of a building, and that department is to-day paying out for other buildings scattered throughout the city of Washington, for its necessary use, the sum of $131,734 as rent to private owners for necessary space in which to do its business.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to insert here, as part of my remarks, a recapitulation of the rents paid by the Government for private property, taken from the Journal of the American Institute of Architects:

A recapitulation of the rentals paid in Washington by the Government shows the following:

State Department	$28,594
Treasury Department	11,350
War Department	9,700
Engineer Department, Army	5,070
Quartermaster, Army	32,639
Navy Department	42,100
Interior Department	76,675
Post Office Department	43,460
Department of Agriculture	131,734
Department of Commerce	66,500
Department of Labor	20,000
Department of Justice	43,000
Board of Mediation and Conciliation	2,820
Interstate Commerce Commission	72,089
Public Printer	3,293
District of Columbia	14,992
Total	604,000

The total of these rents is $604,000. I take it that money is not worth to the Government more than 3 per cent, and these rents would pay interest at that rate on $20,000,000.

It must be remembered, too, that the Government is paying these rents not only on the buildings they occupy, but on many very valuable sites. In many instances the land on which the building is located is worth many times as much as the building itself. I do not know, but I think it is a safe estimate that all the sites rented by the Government, taken together, are much more valuable than the total of the improvements on them.

Why should the Government be paying rent on sites? It already owns numerous proper locations for Government buildings. It owns good sites just at the places where these buildings should be located, and these are of very great value. They are lying idle, yielding the Government no income whatever. The $20,000,000 could be devoted entirely to buildings on these sites already owned by the Government. It would build sufficient and well to house all these departments for many years to come; so, as a matter of economy, I submit to the House, Congress certainly ought to change its policy in reference to these matters.

No private enterprise would tolerate our methods here for a minute. No private enterprise could endure under such careless and incompetent management.

And perhaps what is more important than anything else is the fact that many of these buildings rented by the Government are wholly unfit for the purpose for which the Government is paying exorbitant rents. In many of them valuable documents and files are kept, where in case of fire the Government would suffer an inestimable loss for which Congress would and should be rightly blamed.

Imagine these great departments with hundreds—and some of them with thousands—of employees broken up and scattered far away from the central head of the department. One can readily see that such a plan works against the efficiency of the department and the loss to the Government in that regard can hardly be estimated.

But outside of the questions of economy, efficiency, and safety, there ought to be some pride in Congress to make the Capital at least respectable. If we can do so at a saving of money and at the same time increase the efficiency in the departments, what excuse have we to pursue this method any longer? There is no excuse, and Congress owes it to itself and to the country to change this plan and pursue a different method that will better comport with good business conduct and common sense.

I want to suggest a plan that has come to mind that seems to me would help Congress to work out a reformation. I propose that the House create a permanent standing committee, or, what might be better still, let a joint committee of the House and Senate be created with jurisdiction of this matter. It ought not be a large committee, not exceeding four members, whose business it should be to thoroughly investigate the whole situation and report it to Congress fully, to act in conjunction with the heads of the several departments, and thus ascertain their needs. Let it investigate the question of sites, the character of the buildings required for the convenience of the Government, and report to Congress from time to time the needs of the several departments, so that Congress may know at all times just what economy and efficiency in the departments require.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal more could be said on this subject, but I have said enough, I am sure, to satisfy any Member who will give the subject brief consideration that we have been pursuing a short-sighted, stupid policy, and that we ought to change it. If Congress will only act with a view of working out some reformation along this line, we can save the Government millions of dollars, make secure the valuable documents and records of the Government, wonderfully increase the efficiency of the departments, add to the beauty of the Capital, and by doing so we will make Congress a great deal more respectable in the eyes of the people.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the paragraph just read makes an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of promoting commerce with South and Central America. I am very much in favor of that appropriation. I think we might, as a matter of fact, have appropriated even more than that for that purpose, and yet when I think of the expenditure we are making and propose to continue to make for the purpose of promoting commerce in South and Central America I can not but regret that after having promoted commerce in the country to the south of us, we have not seen fit to protect the men who have gone down there to establish business and to extend the trade of the United States. Three years ago there were something like 50,000 Americans in the Republic to the south of us, engaged largely in the business of promoting American commerce. Through their efforts and their labors, by reason of their energy and their interest in the commerce of their country, we had increased our business with Mexico until it amounted to many millions annually. After having encouraged these people to go to Mexico to establish themselves there, to enter into business, to encourage the exportation of American goods, to increase the business of their country with Mexico, when the time came that they needed our protection we virtually sent word to them that we could not protect them; that we had no disposition to protect them; that we did not intend to protect them, and that they had better come home. Most of them did. The bodies of several hundred of them now rest in Mexican soil.

The wires bring us to-day news not only of the murder of Americans in Mexico, but an invasion of American soil by those who have been encouraged by our pusillanimous attitude to invade our territory. And yet in this bill we are proposing $100,000 for the purpose of promoting and extending American trade in South and Central America. For what purpose? For what purpose and with what expectation? After our people have establish themselves in business and the professions in South and Central America, extending the trade and commerce of their country under our encouragement, I suppose in the case of a revolution or an uprising we would again tell them we did not expect to, we did not propose to, give them any protection; the best we could do for them would be to advise them to come back home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Can not the gentleman extend his remarks in the RECORD? We have been as liberal as we could.

Mr. MONDELL. Not with me, because I have not taken any time on this bill.

Mr. SISSON. Should everybody take advantage of the kindness of the committee there is no telling where it would end. The gentleman is not discussing the item in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I am. I do not intend to do anything but discuss the item in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will confine himself to the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I shall do that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the gentleman is discussing the Mexican situation, which has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to talk about the promotion of commerce in the country south of us. I want to ask the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle what they propose to do after we have promoted commerce in South and Central America, if perchance a condition should arise under which our people there, promoting commerce, should need our protection? What do you propose to do?

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. To answer that question.

Mr. SABATH. I would ask the gentleman another question in addition to what he proposes to do. What would he advise us to do? To appropriate, instead of $100,000, $100,000,000 to send our Army to Mexico? Is he ready to do that? Is he willing to enlist?

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman through with his speech?

Mr. SABATH. I am asking a question of the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I can tell the gentleman exactly what I would do. I would do exactly what this administration has not done——

Mr. SABATH. But what would you do? What would you recommend the administration doing?

Mr. MONDELL. You get a Republican administration in charge of the affairs of this Government and, first, it will not interfere with the domestic affairs of an independent neighbor.

Mr. SABATH. But I ask the gentleman what he would do?

Mr. MONDELL. First, we will not interfere with the domestic affairs of a foreign country, and then we will protect Americans and will do it in a wise and proper way, whichever seems the wise and proper way at the time and under the circumstances. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will see that I get more time, I will let him make a speech in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MONDELL. For a question only.

Mr. SABATH. That question is this, and I will try to make it clear: The gentleman said a moment ago that he favored a wise action. What is the wise action the gentleman speaks about?

Mr. MONDELL. At the beginning of this administration, the administration first interfered with the domestic affairs of the Republic south of us, and then continued its meddlesome interference until there was not a faction in the Republic that did not hate the American name. It sent word to those trade and commerce and business missionaries who had gone there to make the American name honored and respected and carry the prestige and the honor of the country, to increase its commerce—it sent word to them that their nation did not propose to protect them.

One of the men who had gone into that southern Republic and had done as much as any man that I know of to extend American commerce there, told me, in a room adjacent to this Chamber, that when he went to the office of the Secretary of State to ask that some protection be given to his property in the vicinity of Tampico after he had been denied protection of his person, he was told—not by the gentleman who now occupies the office of Secretary of State, but by a former Secretary—"If you think this Government——

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not. He was told, "If you think this Government is going to protect your property in Mexico, you are mistaken." This was after our Government had deserted this man and hundreds of other Americans in Tampico to the fury of a Mexican mob—our Government refused to protect either lives or property in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is most bitter in denouncing the administration because it has not long ago taken some action, and such action as he thinks ought to have been taken, in Mexico. When this administration came into power there was left to it the same difficulty in Mexico that exists now.

There never was a word said, so far as anybody recollects, by the gentleman from Wyoming in criticism of Mr. Taft for keeping our country out of war with a sister Republic. I am thankful that we had at that time in the presidential chair a man who was patriotic enough to do everything he could to keep our country from war with the country across the border. I am also thankful that we have had an administration by Mr. Wilson, who has had the patriotism, who has had the interest of this country so at heart, not to plunge our country into war with that Republic.

And so the gentleman may complain, the gentleman may criticize, because some property, as he says, in Mexico has not been protected by the boys of this country marching across the border that they might protect, at so great a loss of life, the property that those people might have down there. I think that Mr. Taft did right. I think that President Wilson has done right in not asking the boys of this country to march into Mexico in order that they might protect the property that somebody had there.

One great difficulty is that some men who own this property sit back and want the Government to protect them, and yet are unwilling to go themselves, or that their boys should go to war to protect their property.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. In just a moment. I am tired hearing upon this floor, continually, men who talk about protecting property in Mexico at the point of the sword. I think it is time for us to think about our country in peace; and the man who has been in the White House through all this trouble and proposes to keep our country at peace if possible with that Republic deserves the highest gratitude of the American people.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman think we should protect the rights of our citizens?

Mr. FOSTER. I think this country has done what it could to protect the lives of the people and has looked after them in every way it possibly could. As the gentleman knows, we have appropriated large sums of money to help those people who were in Mexico, that they might come to a place of safety. But I do not believe that it is the duty of our Government, when these people have had the opportunity to come and our Government has afforded them every opportunity to come, to ask our Army to go down there and plunge our country into war, and lose thousands of young men of our country and millions of dollars in order to protect the property of some man in that country who persists in staying there.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. How does the gentleman interpret that plank in his party's platform that says our citizens shall be protected on foreign soil and along the border? Do you think you are carrying out that provision?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that this administration is doing everything it can possibly do to protect the people of this country, and will continue to do so. But I know that the gentleman from Washington does not ask that this administration should send the Army down into Mexico to protect the property of some individual, or that American boys shall be asked to give up their lives in order that a little property may be saved. We should act only in the interest of humanity.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET. Does the gentleman know that our troops to-day, in following out this engagement, have crossed the Mexican line, and that our Government this afternoon has asked the permission of the Government of Mexico to send more troops into Mexico?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if President Wilson has done that, he has been convinced that the time has come when such action ought to be taken. But I will say further to the gentleman from New York, as I have said here before, that our President has done everything in his power to keep this country from war. If we must go to war in Mexico it will be only when the President is convinced that nothing else can be done. If the Army shall be sent, then I am sure the President will only do so to protect the lives of our people and not for property. I have faith in his patriotism in these matters and feel that he believes he is justified in doing so, and I am willing to trust him to act and not be criticizing him continually on the floor of this House. If troops have been sent to Mexico, I am sure it is to protect human life and not for property. There may be a time when we must punish some act of lawlessness of bandits, but we have no quarrel with the people of Mexico. Every American can trust the President to protect the lives of our people, and they will be with him in doing so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] moves that all debate on the pending paragraph be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the amendment which I offered this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the amendment which he offered to the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject I talked about.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Steamboat-Inspection Service: Supervising Inspector General, $4,000; chief clerk and Acting Supervising Inspector General in the absence of that officer, $2,000; clerks—2 of class 3, 1 of class 2, 1 of class 1, 2 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; messenger; in all, $16,440.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on this paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is all right. The gentleman can do that when the bill is considered at the next sitting of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in charge of the bill moves that the committee do now rise. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. SABATH. I do. I move to strike out the entire paragraph, and I desire to speak to that amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, the rights of the gentleman will be preserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Chair recognizes his motion, which will be pending. If the committee rises, which is within its province, that will delay the consideration of the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois until the next sitting of the committee. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 12207) and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3331. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below.

S. 3331. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3518. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 3144. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Pend Oreille River, between the towns of Metaline and Metaline Falls, in the State of Washington; and

S. 3873. An act to authorize the counties of Minidoka and Cassia, State of Idaho, to construct a bridge across Snake River.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BROWN OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I announce to the House the death of our colleague and fellow worker, Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., of West Virginia.

At a later date I shall ask the House to set aside a day to pay appropriate tribute to his life, character, and public services.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask for the immediate consideration of the following resolution:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 162.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., a Representative from the State of West Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. NEELY, Mr. LITTLEPAGE, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. Moss of West Virginia, Mr. COOPER of West Virginia, Mr. GLASS, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. SAUNDERS, Mr. WOODS of Iowa, Mr. LINDBERGH, Mr. PORTER, Mr. WILSON of Florida, Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas, Mr. TILSON, Mr. RIORDAN, Mr. CONRY, Mr. PLATT, Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. HAYES, and Mr. RUCKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House that the funeral train will leave the Union Station at 12.40 to-morrow night, and that the sleeping cars will be open at 10 p. m.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 10, 1910, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War ad interim, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of West Pass, Appalachicola, Fla. (H. Doc. No. 860); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustration.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War ad interim, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on reexamination of Mattaponi River, Va., (H. Doc. No. 861); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War ad interim, submitting a recommendation that House bill No. 112, to regulate the hours of labor in continuous-working plants in the United States be so amended as to exempt the Panama Canal Zone (H. Doc. No. 862); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a draft of legislation to amend the sundry civil act of August 1, 1914, so as to provide that the necessary amount of the appropriation may be used for the installation of lighting fixtures in the old customhouse and post-office building at New Orleans, La. (H. Doc. No. 863); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War ad interim, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the service of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 864); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for printing and binding for the Patent Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917 (H. Doc. No. 865); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a draft of proposed legislation to permit the holding of a larger proportion of gold bullion and foreign gold coin as a reserve against gold certificates than at present authorized under section 6 of the currency act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the act of March 2, 1911 (H. Doc. No. 866); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we would express the highest hope and aspiration of our national life in the prayer, Thy will be done. As we take Thy name reverently upon our lips, as we call upon Thee as our Father in heaven, we express that unity of spirit and that high purpose of life that we would have characterize all our actions and guide us in all the deliberations of our life.

We pray Thee to-day to look upon us in Thy mercy. In the midst of a world war mad do Thou guide us and help Thy servants, who desire to guide our national life not only in safety and honor but in its mission of good will among men, so that the honor that we achieve may be the honor inspired by the spirit of God.

Our hearts are saddened this morning by the sudden death of one of the trusted officers of the Senate, who for many years has been faithful to the trust committed to him. We are reminded of that path that we are following. We pray that the influence of a worthy, trusted, conscientious life may abide with its ministry upon all connected with the Senate, and that all going forth into the great beyond may leave the record unsullied, unstained, as children of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I present a resolution adopted at the meeting of the Commandery of Maine, Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, held in Portland, March 1, 1916, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILITARY ORDER OF THE LOYAL LEGION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Portland, March 1, 1916.

Hon. CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the stated meeting of the Commandery of Maine, Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, held in Portland, March 1, 1916, the following action was taken, the vote being unanimous:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this commandery that the Congress of the United States should pass all necessary measures to properly and adequately prepare our country for any possible conflict with any foreign power.

"Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to every Member from Maine of the Senate and the House of Representatives."

By order of Capt. Horace H. Shaw, commander.

HORATIO STAPLES, Recorder.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I present a resolution adopted by the Androscoggin County Association of Rural Letter Carriers, of Maine, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUBURN, ME., February 22, 1916.

Resolved, That the members of Androscoggin County Association of Rural Letter Carriers, here assembled, do hereby heartily approve and indorse the following bills which have been introduced in the House of Representatives:

The compensation bill (H. R. 476), introduced by Mr. MCGILLICUDDY.
The retirement bill (H. R. 5757), introduced by Mr. HAMILL.
The rural free delivery bill (H. R. 72), introduced by Mr. TOWNER.

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each of the Maine Congressmen and to ask that they give these bills their aid and support.

W. H. WATERMAN,
G. N. EVELETH,
Committee on Resolutions.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION, UTAH.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with two amendments, the bill (S. 57) to authorize the Secretary of War to permit the use of a right of way over and across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation for the construction and operation of a standard-gauge railway spur connecting with local or transcontinental railroads, and I submit a report (No. 248) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill just reported. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "regulations," to strike out "as to construction and joint use by such railroad, and any that may be hereafter constructed, as he may deem proper," and insert "and conditions as to its construction, operation, and maintenance as he may prescribe," so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to permit the use of a right of way over and across the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, in the State of Utah, for the construction and operation of a standard-gauge railway spur connecting, directly or indirectly, with any transcontinental or local railroad now entering Salt Lake City, Utah, under such regulations and conditions as to its construction, operation, and maintenance as he may prescribe, to the extent of 25 feet on each side of the center line of such railway and to such further extent as may be required for the construction, operation, and maintenance of such sidetracks, switches, and other terminal facilities as may be necessary to satisfy the military transportation requirements of Fort Douglas as they now or may hereafter exist.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "Provided," to strike out "however" and insert "That any railroad now entering or that may hereafter enter Salt Lake City may, upon obtaining a permit from the Secretary of War, use the spur track herein authorized to be placed upon the reservation upon the payment of just compensation therefor; and if the parties concerned can not agree upon the amount of such compensation the sum or sums to be paid for said use shall be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided also, That the right is reserved to the United States, at any time it may be deemed desirable, to purchase the spur track herein authorized at the actual cost of its construction, less depreciation to the time of purchase: And provided further," so as to read:

Provided, That any railroad now entering or that may hereafter enter Salt Lake City may, upon obtaining a permit from the Secretary of War, use the spur track herein authorized to be placed upon the reservation upon the payment of just compensation therefor; and if the parties concerned can not agree upon the amount of such compensation, the sum or sums to be paid for said use shall be fixed by the Secretary of War: Provided, also, That the right is reserved to the United States, at any time it may be deemed desirable, to purchase the spur track herein authorized at the actual cost of its construction, less depreciation to the time of purchase: And provided further, That any permission given by the Secretary of War under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successor in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right or an easement or interest in, to, or over said Fort Douglas Military Reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN LANDS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yesterday the Committee on Indian Affairs reported the bill (S. 3251) confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington. It is identical with House bill 8092, which has passed the House. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill and that the House bill may receive present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the House bill been reported to the Senate? What is the status of the House bill? let the Chair inquire at the desk.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is identical with the Senate bill, which has been reported and is now on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill is not before the Senate but is before the Committee on Public Lands. In that case the committee will have to be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8092) confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to say to my colleague that I received a letter from some one at Wenatchee asking for an opportunity to be heard on this bill, as it is a bill affecting some lands there. Personally I hope the measure will be passed, but they asked for an opportunity to be heard, which no one would deny, and I assured them that they would have an opportunity to come before the committee and present whatever they might have to say. I submit to my colleague whether under such circumstances he thinks it would not be better to give them an opportunity to be heard. I do not like to object, because I think the bill ought to pass, but they asked for an opportunity to be heard and I supposed they would have it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The bill has been reported from the committee.

Mr. JONES. That is what I understood; but I received a letter a couple of days ago in which they asked if they could make an application to the chairman of the committee, and I said yes, they would have an opportunity to be heard. I think the bill ought to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington objects to the present consideration of the bill. It will take the place on the calendar of the Senate bill.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10032) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river, within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa., and I submit a report (No. 246) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERRIMACK RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 11628) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River, and I submit a report (No. 247) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE SITE, CALUMET, MICH.

Mr. ASHURST. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I have been directed to report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10487) reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the provision of the public building act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., p. 878), which authorizes the acquisition of a suitable site for the post office at Calumet, Mich., be amended as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, accept a title which reserves or excepts all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A few days ago I reported favorably from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the bill commonly known as the good-roads bill. It is the bill (H. R. 7617) to provide that in order to promote agriculture, afford better facilities for rural transportation and marketing farm products, and encourage the development of a general system of improved highways, the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, shall in certain cases aid the States in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads which may be used in the transportation of interstate commerce, military supplies, or postal matter. I now desire to file a report (No. 250) to accompany the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed.

QUARTERMASTER SUPPLIES AND STORES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4726) to permit issue by the supply departments of the Army to certain military schools and colleges, and I submit a report (No. 249) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to the report.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to issue, at his discretion and under such regulations as he may prescribe, such quartermaster supplies and stores belonging to the Government, and which can be spared for that purpose, as may appear to be required for the establishment and maintenance of military instruction camps by the students of any educational institution to which an officer of the Army is detailed as professor of military science and tactics, and the Secretary of War shall require a bond in each case in the value of the property for the care and safe-keeping thereof and for the return of the same when required.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 4961) granting an increase of pension to Frank B. Sargent (with accompanying papers); and

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and then referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota introduces a joint resolution, which, without objection, will be read at the desk. The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read it.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 111) directing the President of the United States to send troops into Mexico to hunt down and destroy murdering bands and punish those guilty of the atrocities at Columbus, N. Mex., on the night of March 8, 1916, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the murder of American men, women, and children, resident in Mexico, by Mexican bandits has continued for more than two years; and

Whereas acts of robbery and of fiendish brutality toward American citizens have been of weekly occurrence in that country; and

Whereas this Government, actuated by a most earnest desire to refrain from interference in the internal affairs of Mexico, has exhausted every possible effort to prevent the recurrence of such atrocities and secure redress for the wrongs inflicted upon its citizens; and

Whereas such efforts have been worse than fruitless, and the failure of this Government to exert its active powers to protect the lives and property of its citizens, have emboldened and encouraged these bandits to the commission of further atrocities against our people; and

Whereas on the 8th day of March, 1916, a band of these Mexican marauders, under the command and by the direction of their leader, Francisco Villa, actually invaded American territory, and in the dead of night massacred 23 American men and women in the city of Columbus, N. Mex.; and

Whereas there is no government whatever in Mexico capable of punishing these atrocious acts or to protect American lives; and

Whereas these brutalities, culminating in the invasion of our own soil and the massacre of our people, can not longer be borne: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, directed to immediately send into Mexico a sufficient force to hunt down and destroy these murdering bands and punish all those guilty of these atrocities against our citizens wherever they may be found. And the President is authorized to use any force necessary to carry into effect this purpose or to overcome any opposition from any source in Mexico to prevent its accomplishment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can not be done to-day without unanimous consent. The author of the resolution has asked to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to be heard for a moment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not before the Senate and can not be considered on the day of its introduction except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. I object to its immediate consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. I asked for the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish to debate the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no debatable question before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I am before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not be before the Senate unless some debatable question is pending.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to offer a memorial, out of order, to the Senate and to submit a few words in connection with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent to present a memorial out of order and to address the Senate at this time, briefly in connection with it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to talk three or four minutes on the memorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is sure the Senator would not get the floor for one purpose and pervert it to another.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to assure Senators that I know as well as anyone that this is a time for prudent and temperate speech. I am not accustomed to approve of intemperate speech; I was never reared in that way. In my judgment, intemperate speech would be out of place now and here. On the other hand, I have never been in the habit of dipping my words into a tank of diplomatic antiseptic before I allowed them to escape from my lips; and I think I ought to follow that course this morning.

I am not one who has clamored and railed at the administration because it has made mistakes—if, indeed, it has made any mistakes—in Mexico. I think when impartial history is written and we are removed from the scene of the conflict the judgment of mankind will justify in a large measure the administration's patience with Mexico; yet, Mr. President, I would be false to my constituency, false to the American people, and false to the Senate if I failed now to make some disclosures regarding the situation on the Mexican border.

Mr. President, for more than five months I have visited the Department of State and the Department of War, from time to time, urging that troops be kept on the Mexican border, because I knew as well as anyone can know anything, I knew as well as anybody can predicate a judgment as to what may happen in the future on evidences of the present, that the troubles in Mexico, instead of being ended are just about to begin; but notwithstanding my incessant demands, notwithstanding my repeated requests, my repeated pleadings, and expostulations that a sufficient number of troops be kept on the Mexican border to police it, I find that even a few days ago the War Department was contemplating removing troops to some other place—possibly to join the National Guard and get some experience in maneuvering in connection with the training of the National Guard.

So, Mr. President, I will read a few lines of some correspondence. Notwithstanding my repeated personal requests that troops be kept on the border to protect the towns of Naco, Nogales, and Douglas, which towns are immediately on the Mexican border, the international line going through the town of Douglas, the town of Naco, and the town of Nogales, it has been a difficult task to induce the War Department to believe that there was any real necessity for the continued presence of troops at these points.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota for a question?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator a question. Does not the Senator believe that that massacre committed in his own State justifies Congress in directing the President, with the military force of this Government, to hunt down and punish those bandits wherever they may be?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona will take notice of the fact that the next time he yields he will forfeit whatever right he has to the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. I will not forfeit the floor for a few moments; but I thank the Chair for its warning.

In answer to the question propounded by my friend, the learned Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], I will say that the massacre did not occur in Arizona, but I am none the less interested. I am an American United States Senator, not a State senator. [Applause in the galleries.] Everything concerning the integrity of this Republic, whether it be in Portland, Me., or Portland, Oreg., whether it be in Duluth or in New Orleans, concerns me just as much as if it had occurred in my own State.

Mr. President, in response to the question propounded by the Senator from North Dakota, I will say that I am anxious to vote, and it is the duty of the Senate to vote, to authorize the President immediately to send troops anywhere in Mexico, to hunt out these red-handed cutthroats, bring them back to the little town of Columbus, where they made a funeral pyre out of the bodies of American citizens, and there shoot these bandits on the spot. That is what I think about our duty. I think the President should be authorized to direct our troops to pursue these bandits and give them a salutary lesson; in other words, Mr. President, I think now we should use grapeshot instead of grape juice. [Laughter.]

Here is a letter addressed to me by the Chief of Staff, Maj. Gen. H. L. Scott:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, February 21, 1916.

Hon. H. F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With reference to your call this morning relative to the removal of the Sixth Field Artillery from Douglas May 1, I beg to inform you that I have had the matter looked up and no definite orders have been issued with reference to the removal of the Sixth Field Artillery, but department commanders have been notified that it is desirable to have camps of instruction during the summer for the Field Artillery of the National Guard, and if conditions of the border permit, the Sixth Field Artillery probably will be sent to various camps—

Throughout the United States—for duty in connection with the training of the National Guard.

If they are kept on the border, they will get sufficient training if they do their duty.

I am sure you will understand the dilemma of the department in trying to give instruction to the National Guard and at the same time keep troops on the border, but I assure you this regiment will not be removed even temporarily unless, in the judgment of the department, conditions on the border justify it.

I wish to say that the department has not now one-half the number of troops necessary to protect the lives of American citizens in the towns in my State that are on the border. I speak with some knowledge on the subject. I have received a letter this morning——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not yield, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Well——

Mr. ASHURST. Should I yield, I would lose the floor; therefore I decline to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Arizona stated that he desired to present a memorial. Instead of doing that, he is reading from letters.

Mr. ASHURST. It is a letter of protest. It is a telegram or a letter in the shape of a memorial, or petition in the shape of a telegram.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial has not yet been presented to the Senate. The Senator asked unanimous consent to present a memorial, and his discussion has covered a pretty wide field.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no use in trying to "bottle up" my speech. It would be futile for any Senator to attempt it, because if I have to take all day to say what I feel it is my duty to say, I will take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can proceed at his pleasure. The Chair has not interfered with him.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Chair. I have a letter from a distinguished citizen of Douglas, Ariz. His name, for reasons sufficient to myself, I shall not disclose. He says, among other things:

In regard your letter in which you say Gen. Scott states there is no intention of moving the troops away from here—

That is, Douglas—

Col. Greble, of the Sixth Field Artillery, has already received orders to leave here on the 25th of April with the entire Sixth Field Artillery; and it certainly is a shame to take all of the artillery away from Douglas at the present time, for it is absolutely a cinch—

The word "cinch" being in Southwestern parlance "a dead sure thing," with which the Senate is, of course, familiar—that things in Mexico are not settled.

I concur in the opinion expressed by the writer "that things in Mexico are not settled"; and so long as a bandit such as "Pancho" Villa is at large, things will not be settled in Mexico.

Now, referring to the memorial or petition which I wish to present, it is signed by L. W. Mix, mayor of Nogales, and by Bracey Curtis, president Nogales Chamber of Commerce; it is dated March 9 and reads:

Considering the Mexican raid on Columbus, N. Mex., this morning, general conditions and rumors are that United States Sixth Artillery will leave Nogales next month. We are prompted to remind you that Nogales is justified in requesting the War Department to retain the present company of Artillery and Infantry here, and an increase of Cavalry to control border east and west in case of necessity.

I concur in the views expressed by those two gentlemen.

I have a telegram here that is facetious. I hesitate to read it, because I do not believe this is a time for facetiousness; but I was told yesterday when the department learned that the outrage at Columbus had occurred—Columbus being, I believe, about a mile and a half from the international line—that it gave orders to the troops to pursue the bandits for "2 miles" into Mexico. I do not know whether that is true or not; I heard the rumor, and I know how wrong it is to base any judgment on common rumor. However, here is the telegram, from a gentleman whom I know very well. He says:

DOUGLAS, ARIZ., March 9, 1916.

HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Douglas papers report Villa invaded United States. Killed many citizens at Columbus, N. Mex. Reports from Washington say War Department issued orders United States troops to follow Villa 2 miles across the line. Please send us registered tape, that we may register carefully the ground, because we might miss it an eighth of an inch one way or the other.

C. M. CURRY.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say. I want the country and I want the Senate to know that, so far as in my power lies, I have for five months urged that the troops that are now on the border be kept there and that so fast as trains could carry additional troops they should be sent there to protect our citizens.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. STONE and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to say just a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent will be granted to the Senator from Missouri, unless the Chair hears objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I think every Senator of the United States, whether he is present here this morning or not, feels as indignant and resentful over this brutal and bloody outrage at Columbus, N. Mex., as does the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

Mr. President, the Executive branch of the Government is now using to the utmost all the activities at its command to ascertain the exact facts relating to this matter from its inception to its ending; that is, up to date. The Cabinet has been in session this morning, and may yet be in session, considering this very question in consultation with the military authorities. Until the Senate is informed, as it will be very soon, as to the facts of the occurrence itself and as to the entire situation, it seems to me, if I may be permitted to say so—and I say this with all due respect to my friend from Arizona—that it would comport better with the dignity and responsibility imposed upon us at this juncture to wait, a few hours at least, until the Senate—until the Congress itself—may proceed with that deliberation which a subject of such gravity should have at our hands. Mr. President, that is all I care to say.

Mr. LANE. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I desire to submit a joint resolution for appropriate reference; and, Mr. President, I want to say that I for one am in thorough agreement with the sentiment expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. STONE], and that I shall not undertake to discuss the matter which, of course, lies very near to my heart, until what I consider to be a more appropriate occasion.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 112) to authorize the President to take necessary measures for the protection of American citizens and property in Mexico, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas for three years a condition of anarchy has prevailed on and near our borders and particularly within the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas this Government has exercised the utmost patience and its best efforts through persuasion and representations to assist in restoring order in that unhappy country, and has seen its citizens traveling and doing business in Mexico murdered and outraged and their property destroyed, in violation of their legal rights under the comity of nations and customary and positive international law; and

Whereas this Government has had its flag dishonored and insulted in Mexico, and no reparation made or redress offered; and

Whereas the clear rights of American citizens have been abridged and denied in Mexico, and this Government can not consent to any further abridgment of the rights of American citizens in any respect; and,

Whereas this Government is contending for nothing less high and sacred than the rights of humanity which every government honors itself in respecting, and which no government is justified in resigning on behalf of those under its care and authority: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to use the land and naval forces of the United States and call into service 500,000 volunteers:

First. For the purpose of protecting the lives and property of Americans in Mexico, and as a necessary preliminary to such purpose the opening and maintenance of all rail and other lines of communication between the City of Mexico and the seaports of Mexico as well as with the American border.

Second. For assisting in the prompt establishment of a constitutional government in Mexico and lending same sufficient support to enable the Mexicans themselves to organize and maintain adequate military force with which to disarm all bandits and murderers and restore order and peace.

Resolved further, That we declare our purpose to be as above set forth, and not to be the acquisition or annexation of territory, the overthrow of laws, customs, or constitution, the making of war upon the Mexican people, or interference with the Mexicans in the government of their country; and we declare our further purpose to be the withdrawal of all our armed forces from Mexican territory immediately upon the accomplishment of the objects herein set forth, and to these ends we invite the cooperation of the Mexican people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. HARDING. I present an article on the rural-credits movement by ex-Ambassador Myron T. Herrick and Mr. Rufus Ingalls. I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to it being printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none.

INLAND CANAL NAVIGATION (S. DOC. NO. 354).

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask unanimous consent that a thesis, by First Lieut. Tasker H. Bliss, First Artillery, on the strategical value of the inland canal navigation of the United States, be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless there is objection, such will be the order. The Chair hears none.

ENGINEERING EXPERIMENT STATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 353).

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I introduced yesterday a bill for the establishment of experiment stations in various States regarding engineering and mechanic arts. I have an explanation and statement regarding the necessity of this bill, written by Dean A. A. Potter, division of engineering, Kansas State Agricultural College, and secretary of the Land Grant College Engineering Association. It is a brief document, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and also that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order, unless there is objection. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that the Senator ought to ask that it be printed in the RECORD and also as a public document. I have no objection, if the Senator will ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the Senator that this is a matter of great public interest to many States.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is a very brief statement, indeed; explanatory of the bill, which establishes these experiment stations regarding mechanic arts in the same way that they have been established regarding agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, as well as to have it printed as a public document in connection with the bill itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection if the Senator wants to have it printed in the RECORD; but I do object to having it printed in the RECORD and also as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask, then, that it be printed as a public document in connection with the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

THE RICE CROP.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain letters relating to the statistics of rice production in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SOUTHERN RICE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
Beaumont, Tex., February 21, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Herewith you will please find copy of a letter written this day to the Hon. D. F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture. It is in reply to the Secretary's letter refusing to recanvass the rice-crop estimate of the Bureau of Crop Estimates.

The accuracy of the Government's reports on rice production means a great deal to the rice planters, as the publication of an inflated report is certain to depress prices.

The Southern Rice Growers' Association is a cooperative marketing organization and is interested in seeing accurate reports published by the department. This association is a nonprofit-making organization and has no desire to influence the market by coloring estimates of the crop.

We believe that our method of gathering statistical data on rice is superior to that of the Department of Agriculture, and we resent the action of Mr. Estabrook of the Bureau of Crop Estimates in attempting to belittle our work by referring to it as "incomplete and fragmentary."

We have propounded a number of questions to Mr. Estabrook during this controversy, and he has not shown us the courtesy of a reply. The association has a membership of about 2,000 rice farmers in the States of Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and our sales of association rice for the present season will total over $8,000,000.

The department's rice crop specialist is Mr. Delancy Evans, who lives at Warrenton, Va. We do not believe that any man can live within sight of the Capitol Building and do justice to this position. Mr. Evans's work is in the South and there he should live.

We wish to thank you for the attention you have given the subject and to express the hope that we may count upon your continued cooperation in our efforts to make the rice reports of the department more dependable.

Yours, very truly,

W. B. DUNLAP,
President.

SOUTHERN RICE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,
Beaumont, Tex., February 21, 1916.

Hon. D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Absence from the city has prevented an earlier reply to your letter of January 26, in which you assign various reasons for declining to order a recanvass of the department's estimate of the rice crop.

The question of the sources of information used in compiling the production report of the association was gone into at length in our Mr. Elgnus's letter to Mr. Estabrook, of January 11. Our reason for submitting for your consideration a copy of the Welsh district report was to show in detail the system employed by this office in the compilation of our report. That you may have a better idea of the scope of our work in southwest Louisiana, permit me to state that in the Welsh district we have 129 contracts, in Jennings 181, in Crowley 226, in Elton 67, and in Iota 84, or a total of 687 contracts. The gross acreage represented by our contracts in these five districts totals 136,152 acres. We have in addition to the above named four other offices in southwest Louisiana. While it is true that we do not maintain an office in a few of the smaller producing sections of southwest Louisiana, we do go into these territories and spend sufficient time to secure the needed statistical matter on acreage and production. We cover every rice-producing section of Texas, and in Arkansas our agents are in close touch with at least 95 per cent of the planted area. In view of these facts we feel that it is hardly fair for you to state that the "data collected by the association are necessarily incomplete and fragmentary."

In a letter written by Mr. Elgnus under date of December 21 we stated we would "be glad to furnish you with greater detail on any particular section." The only request we had from the bureau for further data was contained in a letter of January 6 from Mr. Estabrook, in which he requested what was in substance a complete census of the planters of the three States, with the quantity of rice produced by each. I do not feel that further comment on such a request is necessary. We were not only willing but anxious to furnish any detail information on any section or State.

You are laboring under a misapprehension when you state that our members sign contracts agreeing to turn over a portion of their crop to the association to sell and intimating that they hold back a portion of their rice to be sold by themselves, thus avoiding the payment of the association commission. This is in nowise true. Our contracts contain the following clause: "To sell all of the rice raised by me."

Again, you make the statement that the association is not in a position to estimate the amount reserved on farms for seed or feed. The amount of rough rice used as a stock food is, of course, largely contingent upon the price. The price of low grades, both in 1914 and 1915, was higher in proportion than the better rices and the amount fed was infinitesimal. The territory covered by the association produced in 1915 approximately five and a half million sacks. We employed in the selling and grading of the association rices about 70 trained rough-rice men. These men were in close touch with the planters of the various sections and their familiarity with the conditions on the plantations enable them to form a better opinion of the amount of rice used for feed than that of your crop reporters. When it comes to the question of seed rice, I desire to state emphatically that our agents have a better knowledge of the rices reserved for seed than any other class of reporters. They grade out a great deal of seed for planters, and in addition are constantly on the lookout for good seed rices for our members.

You speak of your State field agents devoting a portion of their time to the inspection of rice fields. In all seriousness, do you think that your Texas State agent, Mr. Gray, of Houston, has spent sufficient time in the rice fields in the past year to familiarize himself with acreage and production? I am interested in two large rice farms near Houston, on which was grown last year about 30,000 acres of rice. This represents about 80 per cent of the area planted to rice in the Houston section, and if Mr. Gray has spent five days there in the past five years I have not heard of it. Further than that, I do not remember of his ever having been on either farm.

It is true that we were in error in reducing the department's estimate from 28,947,000 bushels to 7,236,750 bags. The system of reducing the department's figures from bushels to bags by dividing by four has been the practice of rice men for years, and it was due to this custom that we made the error.

It is also true that the average weight per bag was heavier in 1915 than in former years. This was largely due to the smaller production of Honduras.

I was very much interested in the paragraph in your letter pertaining to the weight per bag of the different varieties. I note that you state that early in the season the department made a careful investigation, involving more than 1,200,000 bags, and that you found the average weight to be as follows: Honduras, 187.3; Japan, 196; Blue Rose, 197.6, and that, allowing for possible shrinkage, 191 pounds would be a conservative estimate of the average weight per bag of the entire crop.

Are you personally conversant with the methods used in this careful investigation made by the department to arrive at these figures? Is it not true that this data was furnished the Bureau of Crop Estimates by a large rice-milling company? The company we have in mind did tabulate the weights on about 800,000 sacks of rice early in the season, and the result of their investigation was identical to a fractional part of a pound with the investigation conducted by your department. If weights other than those furnished by this milling company were used by the bureau, is it not significant that they did not change the weight of any of the varieties at least a decimal part of a pound? At the time the rice-milling company tabulated these weights they had received but a few thousand sacks of Arkansas rice and had not received a single sack of rice from the State of Texas. If we are correct in our belief that the bureau's figures were based on the average weights furnished by this milling company, we will have to borrow one of your expressions and state that your information on weights is "necessarily incomplete and fragmentary."

To determine the average weight per bag our general office has made up a very comprehensive table based on the actual weights of 2,022,226 bags. Of this number, 905,237 were in Texas, 733,804 in Louisiana, and 383,185 in Arkansas. As these rices were weighed at different times during the selling season, we discounted the weights 1 per cent to allow for shrinkage. In analyzing your figures we find that the amount you deducted to cover probable shrinkage was about 1.6 per cent. While we do not agree with your conclusions—that of the total production 40 per cent was Honduras, 15 per cent Japan, and 45 per cent Blue Rose—we have attempted to keep as close to these figures as practicable in the compilation of this table. Of the 2,022,226 bags, 803,154 bags, or 39.7 per cent, were Honduras; 280,065, or 13.8 per cent, Japan; and 929,007, or 46.5 per cent, were Blue Rose.

The weights by varieties and States follow:

Texas.

Honduras	181.4
Japan	191.2
Blue Rose	188.2
Average for State	186.6

Louisiana.

Honduras	185.8
Japan	194.1
Blue Rose	193.5
Average for State	191

Arkansas.

Honduras	177.3
Japan	179.4
Blue Rose	184.9
Average for State	178.9

Averages three States.

Honduras	181.3
Japan	191.4
Blue Rose	190.2
Average weight all varieties 3 States	186.7

We are inclosing herewith a copy of our report of February 1, in which our estimate of the total production is increased from 6,571,460 to 6,638,883 bags. You will note that we have reduced the sackage in Louisiana and increased it in Texas, Arkansas, and California.

This report was made up prior to the completion of our table of weights, which accounts for the California productions being shown in bags of 190 pounds.

The department's estimate of the total production of 28,947,000 bushels, reduced to bags of 186.7 pounds, would show 6,977,048 bags. This is 338,165 bags in excess of the association's report, or an increase of slightly over 5 per cent.

I do not underestimate the value of the general statistical matter furnished by the department. The Government reports have had a tendency to discourage the issuance of either "bull" or "bear" reports by irresponsible dealers calculated to influence the market.

On the other hand the mere statement by the Bureau of Crop Estimates that the total rice production for 1915 was 28,947,000 bushels has very little significance to the planter, and affects him only as the accuracy of the report affects the market. We have three principal varieties of rice, and the planter desires to know just how each variety yielded in different sections or States. This information your Mr. Estabrook has refused to furnish. In fact, he has failed to reply to any of the questions we have asked in connection with the work of his bureau, and we have no knowledge of the department's conclusions on any detail pertaining to this report.

Your vindication of the methods and conclusions of your rice-crop specialist, your State field agents, and your crop reporters has not in any way changed my opinion of their efficiency. Your State field agents do not inspect the rice fields sufficiently to form an intelligent opinion of conditions, if, indeed, they inspect them at all. The reports of your crop reporters are thrown into one common hopper, and in the resultant composite report the opinion of those who are well informed count for no more than the opinion of those who rank lowest in knowledge of crop conditions. Your rice-crop specialist does not spend sufficient time in the rice country to be in close touch with actual conditions. His place is here in the South, not in Washington.

Mr. Estabrook, in a recent newspaper interview given the Washington correspondent of the Times-Picayune, lauded Mr. Evans for the accuracy of a census of rice farmers prepared by him just prior to the publication of the figures on this subject by the Census Bureau. I presume this census was prepared in 1911. Permit me to call your attention to the fact that the actual crop of 1911, in round numbers, was 6,875,000 bags, while the department's estimate was 5,725,000, or over a million one hundred thousand bags below the actual production.

In this same interview Mr. Estabrook laid considerable stress upon the fact that Mr. Evans's grandfather was a rice man. This is interesting, if not important, but does not in any manner influence the accuracy of his reports.

If the thoroughness of the work of the Bureau of Crop Estimates is exemplified in the conclusions reached in the matter of the average weight per bag, is it not indicative of the fact that their methods of securing information on acreage and production might also be "incomplete and fragmentary"?

The final check of the crop of 1915 will be made in August, and we will then know whether we were justified in requesting a recanvass of the department's figures or whether you were right in refusing the request.

Yours, very truly, W. B. DUNLAP, President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have many times in the past entered a mild protest against loading down the RECORD with all sorts of extraneous matters. I find in this morning's RECORD that the speech delivered by ex-Gov. Glynn, of New York, appears twice in the RECORD, and I think it is an abuse that ought in some way to be corrected. I did not object to the request of the Senator from Arkansas, but I want once more to try to impress upon the Senate the fact that the RECORD ought to be a record of the proceedings of Congress and not be filled with matter that occurs outside of the Senate Chamber and has no relation to the business of the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I did not hear all that the Senator from New Hampshire said, but I gathered that he was making some reference to a request I made yesterday and which had the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I merely said that the article that the Senator from New York had inserted—and I do not object to that—appears twice in the RECORD of this morning.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator does not object, then, to the first insertion?

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not. I did say that I think we ought to be somewhat careful not to load down the RECORD with extraneous matter to the extent that is being done sometimes. For instance, there were I do not know how many columns of editorials the other day.

Mr. SMOOT. Seventeen pages—not columns.

Mr. GALLINGER. Seventeen pages of editorials in a single copy of the RECORD; and I think it is an abuse.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I can see how it may be abused at times, but the criticism the Senator makes is really leveled at the action of another House. The same address that I had inserted in the RECORD yesterday morning was also inserted on the same day in the House, although I imagine the action in the House was inadvertent and without knowledge of the previous action taken in this body.

FORT M'HENRY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, on the 7th instant a joint resolution (No. 68) came over from the House ceding to the State of Maryland temporary jurisdiction over certain lands in the Fort McHenry Military Reservation in Baltimore Harbor, and by an error it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as it affects a military reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such will be the order unless there is objection. The Chair hears none. Morning business is closed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Wisconsin proceeds it will be necessary for the Senate to take up the first bill on the calendar under Rule VIII, to have something pending before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The first bill on the calendar was the bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

ARMED MERCHANT VESSELS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, pursuant to a notice which I gave to the Senate two or three days ago, I wish to address myself very briefly to what I conceive to be a question of supreme importance which has grown out of the recent controversy as to the action of the Congress upon certain resolutions.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss generally the resolutions which were introduced warning or requesting American citizens to refrain at this time from travel upon armed belligerent vessels. But in the demand that Congress should vote down such resolutions, President Wilson has raised an issue of the gravest importance to the future well-being of our Government.

I shall address myself to this issue and especially to certain phases of it to which attention has not been invited in this discussion. I shall detain the Senate but a brief time this morning in presenting the propositions which, it seems to me, should be accorded great weight in determining the ultimate action of Congress upon this issue.

In his reply to the letter written him by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the President said, doubtless with some warmth of feeling:

> You are right in assuming that I shall do everything in my power to keep the United States out of war. I think the country will feel no uneasiness about my course in that respect. Through many anxious months I have striven for that object, amid difficulties more manifold than can have been apparent upon the surface, and so far I have succeeded.

Even more than the President may perhaps realize, even more than some of us may now discern, the people of this country are praying that he shall keep us at peace with the world. The President's strength is not to be measured by the judgment of partisan politicians nor the scare headlines of a prejudiced press; but it depends in large measure on how many plain citizens continue to say of him, quite spontaneously in answer to all criticism, "He has kept us out of war." These millions of plain people are not unmindful of the underlying "difficulties" with which he is contending, even though they are not so "apparent on the surface."

Despite violent newspaper attacks and sensational individual assaults, there has been a strong undercurrent of sympathetic support of the President's policy in so far as it makes for peace, and a deep national gratitude for the result thus far attained.

I would not be understood as saying that the President's course has altogether satisfied the general public. But the great majority of men and women are not concerning themselves with the details of diplomacy. They take account of results. Just as in the Mexican situation, so in this European war, so long as we are steered clear of dangerous reefs the people are not going to complain of the man at the wheel, even though they do not understand many of the maneuvers.

Personally I wanted the President to take a very much more aggressive stand for peace. I believed and I still believe he should have called a conference of neutral nations to meet and make articulate the protests of the peaceful half of the world's population, a protest tempered by sympathies and kinship and affection and reason, yet so strong and persistent that its tender for mediation finally should have been welcomed by the warring nations.

But in common with what I believe to be the deeply grounded sentiment of the great majority of our people, I too am glad that in these troublous times we have had a President who has striven and so far has succeeded in keeping us out of war.

I make this preliminary explanation in order to have it clearly understood that it is in no carping spirit that I take issue with President Wilson in his recent extraordinary demand upon Congress.

As I understand the pending controversy, the President assumes it to be the exclusive prerogative of the Executive to pursue any foreign policy, whatever the issue, independent of any suggestion from either or both branches of Congress.

The peremptory manner in which the administration forced action upon the resolution in the Senate, the extraordinary proceedings by which the resolution was changed and tabled, without opportunity for debate or explanation, warrants the belief that the President denies Congress the right to express its opinion upon a matter which lies within its constitutional authority quite as much as that of the Executive.

We must infer from what has transpired that the President in his personal conference with Senators and Representatives made it understood that he considered the whole matter so exclusively within the field of Executive authority that he regarded the introduction and consideration of resolutions advising our citizens to refrain from travel upon armed merchantmen as an interference with his prerogative. Congress was made to understand that a vote of confidence would not suffice, and that nothing less than a complete denial of any intent or purpose to express an opinion or offer advice on the part of Congress would satisfy the Chief Executive.

In his work on "Constitutional Government in the United States," published in 1911, President Wilson clearly defines his views as to the unlimited and exclusive prerogative of the Executive in dealing with foreign affairs:

> One of the greatest of the President's powers I have not yet spoken of at all—his control, which is very absolute, of the foreign relations of a nation. The initiative in foreign affairs which the President possesses without any restriction whatever is virtually the power to control them absolutely. The President can not conclude a treaty with a foreign power without the consent of the Senate, but he may guide every step of diplomacy; and to guide diplomacy is to determine what treaties must be made if the faith and prestige of the Government are to be maintained. He need disclose no step of negotiation until it is complete, and when in any critical matter it is completed the Government is virtually committed. Whatever its disinclination, the Senate may feel itself committed also.

I am quoting from President Wilson's work on "Constitutional Government," published in 1908 and republished in 1911; and I quote from the latest edition.

Mr. President, this statement of the views of Mr. Woodrow Wilson, writing on constitutional government in 1911, might be passed without concern. But if there is warrant to believe that President Wilson may, on the verge of a great world crisis, predicate vitally important and decisive action on that declaration, then, sir, it ought not to go unchallenged, unless we are compelled to accept it as correctly defining the power of the President.

If the President is clothed with such unlimited power, if in conducting foreign affairs he can go unhindered of Congress to the limit of making war inevitable, and if the Congress has no alternative but to accept and sanction his course, then we have become a one-man power, then the President has authority to make war as absolutely as though he were Czar of Russia.

Mr. President, the extent and horror of the European war has caused widespread hysteria. But it has also compelled people to think, and among thoughtful people throughout the world there is a deeply settled conviction that this conflict, with all its appalling sacrifice, is the result of an evil system of secret diplomacy. It is a system, sir, where the fate of nations and the lives of hundreds of millions, in ignorance of a fact or a circumstance in issue, may be sacrificed to win a relatively unimportant diplomatic victory.

If it be asserted that the power claimed by the President rests upon express constitutional and statutory authority, sanctioned by a century of unvarying precedents and custom—which I deny—then the democracy of America, instructed by the bloody history of the last two years, will rewrite our Constitution and our statutes.

The enlightened citizenship of these United States, the men who would be called upon to go into the trenches of hell and death when war comes will demand and will secure a voice either directly or through their Representatives in deciding for or against war. They will no longer submit to have their Representatives—serving as mere automatons—vote empty approval of war, by formal declaration, after war has become inevitable, or has actually been inaugurated by some act of war committed upon the orders of a President.

It will hardly do to say that no President will assume the responsibility of plunging this country into war.

When he became President, there was in the mind of James K. Polk a settled determination to acquire California as one of the achievements of his administration.

I quote from Reeves's American Diplomacy:

> The Mexican War was waged for the purpose of conquest, for the fulfillment of Polk's designs upon California.

Writing of Polk's administration, Schouler, in his History of the United States, says:

> Without a word of warning, however secret, to Congress, which was in full session, with no conference on this subject further than to hint repeatedly, as the Oregon difficulty gave him double excuse for doing without exposing his game, that it was prudent in times of peace to prepare for war, he ordered Gen. Taylor to advance and take a position on the left bank of the Rio Grande [thus invading their disputed territory]; he also assembled a strong fleet in the Gulf of Mexico. * * *
>
> To provoke this feeble sister Republic to hostilities, at the same time putting on her the offense of shedding the first blood, was the step predetermined, if she would not sign away her domain for gold.
> This was the program: To let loose the demon of war, and under the smoke of defending the fourth part of Mexico we had just snatched from her, to despoil her of another. The program succeeded after a struggle, but the dark catastrophe locked up in our bloody acquisitions was hidden for many years.

The President had his way. We acquired California. But as stated by Webster in his arraignment of President Polk:

> No one declared war. Mr. Polk made it.

Mr. President, less than two years have gone by since President Wilson sought the advice and cooperation of Congress upon a situation so grave in its character, so overripe in its development, that it culminated in bloodshed before it was possible for Congress to act at all.

The immediate incident which led on to the landing of the United States troops on foreign soil and the capture of a foreign city and port had transpired on the 9th of April. On that day a boat loaded with American sailors in the uniform of the American Navy landed at the wharf in Tampico, Mexico. They were arrested by a Mexican officer in charge of a guard. They were presently returned to the boat, released from arrest. The action of the officer making the arrest was promptly disavowed by the de facto government. The officer making the unwarranted arrest of our sailors was placed under arrest by his Government. The commandant at Tampico apologized for the act. The head of the de facto Government also promptly apologized. Admiral Mayo—our naval commander at the port—not being satisfied that sufficient amends had been made for the affront committed, made further demand that the Mexican military commander at the port of Tampico should fire a salute of 21 guns, with special ceremony.

The Government de facto consented to fire a salute, but disagreement arose as to the number of guns which should be fired and what were the proper and customary incidents in the way of returning the salute.

Finally, on the 20th of April, the President, in an address made in person, submitted a very brief statement of the matter to Congress, assembled in joint session, and asked its approval that he should use the armed forces of the United States to enforce the demands which had been made.

The President prefaced his request for the approval of Congress to use the armed forces of the United States to enforce the demands made by Admiral Mayo with the assertion that he had the power to act in the premises without the approval of Congress, the prefatory statement being made in the following language—and I quote from President Wilson's message delivered in person before the joint session of the two Houses—

> No doubt I could do what is necessary in the circumstances to enforce respect for our Government without recourse to Congress and yet not exceed my constitutional powers as President.

The President's address was concluded at 3.12 p. m. on April 20, when he retired from the Hall of the House.

That prompt action was desired by the President upon his message to Congress was made known to the House immediately by Mr. UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, who said:

> Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to state to the House that the President informs me that it is of the utmost importance that action should be taken to-day in reference to his message just received. I wish to ask each Member of the House to remain here until the resolution can be passed through the House at a later hour this afternoon.

The resolution passed the House that day, and while it was under consideration in the Senate on the following day the wires brought the news from Mexico that our soldiers had been landed at Vera Cruz and that fighting was in progress in the streets of that city.

Mr. President, I have briefly presented the essential facts of this important event at this time because of its bearing upon the issue which has been raised between the President and Congress.

The differences between the President and the head of the de facto Government of Mexico growing out of the Tampico affair had reached such a stage before he sought the cooperation of Congress and while that matter was at his request under consideration by Congress, that he ordered the armed forces of the United States to capture and hold the port of Vera Cruz and plant our flag on Mexican soil. This order was issued over a disagreement as to whether 5 or 21 blank cartridges should be fired by the Mexicans to accentuate their apology, which had already been voluntarily tendered for the offending act of a subordinate officer. He acted without authority from Congress. We invaded Mexico with an armed force. Bloodshed on both sides followed as the inevitable result.

Had it been Great Britain or Germany or any other great power on earth, instead of poor, weak, bankrupt, distracted Mexico, we would have been involved in a war the cost and sacrifice and suffering of which is beyond the imagination of man to portray.

Not to digress, I might say, in view of the attack made yesterday upon Columbus, N. Mex., by a band of Mexicans led by the outlaw Villa, that, whenever necessary, the prompt pursuit of raiders who have violated the rights of American citizens upon American soil across the borders into their own country, for the purpose of dispersing the band, is easily distinguished in fact and principle and presents an entirely different question from that raised by the Vera Cruz incident.

If the President has the power to order the forces of the United States to invade a foreign country, capture a city, and slay its people, as in the case of Vera Cruz, he has the absolute power to make war at will.

I do not believe the framers of our Constitution ever intended to invest him with such power, either directly or as an incident to any power directly conferred upon him.

In his letter to Senator STONE the President says:

> But in any event our duty is clear. No nation, no group of nations, has the right while war is in progress to alter or disregard the principles which all nations have agreed upon in mitigation of the horrors and sufferings of war; and if the clear rights of American citizens should very unhappily be abridged or denied by any such action we should, it seems to me, have in honor no choice as to what our own course should be.

In view of this alternative which we are told we must face, Congress, if mindful of what happened at Vera Cruz, as well as of the lessons of history and of the appalling consequences of the involvement of the United States in this European war, was bound to take action, to express its views, and to offer counsel which might avert the pending disaster.

In my opinion we have fallen short of our obligation and duty rather than exceeded it.

We are, indeed, placed in an extraordinary position before the world, if Congress must unconditionally surrender all right to voice the popular will in a situation such as now confronts us.

The grave consequences of such a result are foreshadowed in the announcement of three Members of Congress that they will voluntarily retire from public life because of the course they felt compelled to follow on their vote in the House on the resolution of warning.

One Member of high standing, serving his seventh term, brother of the ambassador to England, thus states his position:

> The President is not satisfied with an unreserved expression of confidence on the part of Congress, but demands a vote upon the warning of American citizens to refrain from using armed vessels of belligerent countries, asking that it be voted down. This shifts to the conscience and convictions of Members of Congress a responsibility that the Constitution imposed upon the Executive.

Of course I do not agree with that view. Continuing Mr. PAGE said:

> Having the responsibility thrust upon me, I claim the right to exercise my own judgment and convictions and not have them dictated by some one else. I do not believe that an American should insist upon the exercise of any abstract right that will jeopardize the peace of his country.

Mr. President, if our Constitution and laws are so fundamentally weak in this hour of need as to cause such sacrifice of conscientious men in the public service, then let us proceed without delay to amend them and make our Government in fact, as well as in form, what it was intended to be—a democracy.

But is it true that the Constitution vests such unlimited and unconditional authority in the President that it becomes an offense for Congress to take such action as has been proposed in the Senate and the House?

If it is claimed that such unlimited power is conferred by the statute creating the State Department, the way out is easy. Congress created the State Department and can amend or destroy any autocratic power not conferred by the Constitution. Does the Constitution convey such power?

It was far from the intent of the constitutional convention that the President should have absolute power in the conduct of foreign affairs. Fearful of kingly prerogative the framers of the Constitution were not at first inclined to let the President have much to do with foreign relations. The Continental Congress kept this function of government in its own hands or under its own control. But this had not proven entirely satisfactory.

The original proposal to the Constitutional Convention was to give the power to declare war to Congress, and the power to make treaties, to appoint and receive ambassadors to the Senate.

Very late in the deliberations it was suggested by Madison that the President should have a share in the treaty-making power. The convention had been in session from May to September, and it was only 13 days before its final adjournment when the Executive was given a part in the conduct of foreign relations. And it is important to note that the only power then committed to the President exclusively was that of receiving foreign ambassadors and ministers. This was done because it would be inconvenient to call a special session of the Senate whenever a new ambassador or minister was to be received.

Out of this exclusive power to receive official representatives of foreign countries was evolved the general presumption that the recognition of belligerency and sovereignty belongs solely to the President.

Rawle, in his great work on the Constitution, says:

> The power of receiving foreign ambassadors carries with it, among other things, the right of judging in the case of revolution in a foreign country whether the new rulers ought to be recognized.

Willoughby, in his work on the Constitution, qualifies even this prerogative of the recognition of sovereignty, as follows:

> At times the claim has been made that this power of recognition is one to be exercised at the dictation of Congress, but precedents are against the claim. It is to be presumed, however, that when the recognition of a status of belligerency or of the independence of a revolutionary Government is likely to institute a casus belli with some foreign power, the President will be guided in large measure by the wishes of the legislative branch. Upon the other hand, it is the proper province of the Executive to refuse to be guided by a resolution on the part of the Legislature, if, in his judgment, to do so would be unwise. The Legislature may express its wishes or opinions, but may not command.

But Congress in the matter recently before us, has been practically denied the right of even expressing an opinion.

President Jackson in a message to Congress, December 21, 1836, referring to the fact that the two Houses acting separately had passed resolutions at the previous sessions to the effect—

> That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power—said:

> Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in Congress or in any of our legislative bodies as to whom belonged the power of originally recognizing a new State—a power the exercise of which is equivalent under some circumstances to a declaration of war; a power nowhere expressly delegated, and only granted in the Constitution, as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to Congress, in that given to the President and Senate to form treaties with foreign powers and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers, and in that conferred upon the President to receive ministers from foreign nations.
> It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the Constitution and most safe that it [the power to recognize new States] should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country and a perfect guaranty to all other nations of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.

Referring to the recognition of States, Rawle says:

> It would not be justifiable in the President to involve the country in difficulties merely in support of an abstract principle if there was not a reasonable prospect of perseverance and success on the part of those who have embarked in the enterprise. * * * The power of Congress on this subject can not be controlled; they may, if they think proper, acknowledge a small and helpless community, though with a certainty of drawing a war upon our country; but greater circumspection is required from the President, who, not having the constitutional power to declare war, ought ever to abstain from a measure likely to produce it.

Rawle further says:

> In case of war breaking out between two or more foreign nations, in which the United States are not bound by treaty to bear a part, it is the duty of the Executive to take every precaution for the preservation of their neutrality, and it is a matter of justice, both to those nations and to our own citizens, to manifest such intention in the most public and solemn manner. The disquietude of the belligerent parties is thus obviated, our own citizens are warned of the course it becomes their duty to pursue, and the United States avoid all responsibility for acts committed by the citizens in contravention of the principles of neutrality. It is the office of the Legislature to declare war; the duty of the Executive, so long as it is practicable, to preserve peace.

Alexander Hamilton, discussing in the Federalist, No. 75, the treaty-making power, defines the combined authority invested by the Constitution in Congress and the President upon broad general principles. His argument and conclusion are directly applicable to the present controversy, and they are most illuminating.

> Though several writers on the subject of government place that power (the power of making treaties) in the class of executive authorities, this is evidently an arbitrary disposition; for, if we attend carefully to its operation, it will be found to partake more of the legislative than of the executive character, though it does not seem strictly to fall within the definition of either. The essence of the legislative authority is to enact laws; or, in other words, to prescribe rules for the regulation of society; while the execution of the laws and the employment of the common strength, either for this purpose or for the common defense, seem to comprise all the functions of the executive magistrate. The power of making treaties is plainly neither the one nor the other. It relates neither to the execution of the subsisting laws nor to the enacting of new ones, and still less to an exercise of the common strength. Its objects are contracts with foreign nations, which have the force of law, but derive it from the obligation of good faith. They are not rules prescribed by the sovereign to the subject, but agreements between sovereign and sovereign. The power in question seems therefore to form a distinct department and to belong properly neither to the legislative nor to the executive. The qualities elsewhere detailed as indispensable in the management of foreign negotiations point out the executive as the most fit agent in these transactions, while the vast importance of the trust and the operation of treaties as laws plead strongly for the participation of the whole or a portion of the legislative body in the office of making them. * * *
> The history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world to the sole disposal of a magistrate created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.

Other high authority may be cited to the effect that the constitutional right to recognize foreign States should not at all times be exercised exclusively by the President, it being consistent with the spirit of the Constitution and most safe at critical times, as Jackson points out, for the President to confer with Congress as to this prerogative, the only one specially conferred on the Executive.

This being true, how preposterous that Congress, the people's representative body, should have no voice whatever in matters of great moment that may determine the ultimate fate of the Nation.

President Wilson's course, so far as I can discover, is not only unusual but unprecedented in demanding that Congress keep silent in all that pertains to foreign affairs. The only justification for the President's interference was that in some way not obvious to Congress the warning resolutions might paralyze the negotiations which were being carried on. Even if this were true, it would seem that the President might have appealed to Congress in a message to defer action.

However, it is now reported, apparently upon authority, that the State Department proposes to accomplish indirectly the object that the warning resolutions of Congress were intended directly to accomplish. If this is true, it serves to emphasize even more strongly that the only purpose of the President's remarkable course was to maintain a clear title in the Executive to conduct foreign affairs without any suggestion from Congress. He was enforcing to the letter his views expressed in the paragraph which I have quoted from his work on Constitutional Government.

Up to the present time, so far as I have been able to investigate the matter, no President has attempted to enforce such extreme views. Congress has always exercised the privilege of expressing opinion, giving counsel, and not infrequently has taken the initiative in suggestions as to conduct of foreign affairs.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 2, chapter 49, cites many instances where Congress has asserted its right to a voice in foreign affairs. In 1811 the House originated and the Senate agreed to a resolution as follows:

Taking into view the present state of the world, the peculiar situation of Spain and of her American Provinces, and the intimate relations of the territory eastward of the River Perdido, adjoining the United States, to their security and tranquillity: Therefore Resolved, etc., That the United States can not see with indifference any part of the Spanish Provinces adjoining the said States eastward of the River Perdido pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign power.

In 1821 Mr. Clay introduced the following resolution, which passed the House:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish Provinces of South America, which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence, and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said Provinces.

On behalf of the committee appointed to present the resolution to the President, Mr. Clay reported:

That the President assured the committee that, in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives, he felt great interest in the success of the Provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence, and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration, with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated.

In 1825 there was a long debate in the House relating to an unconditional appropriation for the expenses of the ministers to the Panama Congress. According to Mr. HINDS's summary of this debate the opposition to the amendment, led by Mr. Webster, was that—

While the House had an undoubted right to express its general opinion in regard to questions of foreign policy, in this case it was proposed to decide what should be discussed by the particular ministers already appointed. If such instructions might be furnished by the House in this case, they might be furnished in all, thus usurping the power of the Executive.

James Buchanan and John Forsyth, who argued in favor of the amendment—contended that it did not amount to an instruction to diplomatic agents, but was a proper expression of opinion by the House. The House had always exercised the right of expressing its opinion on great questions, either foreign or domestic, and such expressions were never thought to be improper interference with the Executive.

In April, 1864, the House originated and passed a resolution declaring that—

It did not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge a monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America, under the auspices of any European power.

On May 23 the House passed a resolution requesting the President to communicate any explanation given by the Government of the United States to France respecting the sense and bearing of the joint resolution relative to Mexico.

The President transmitted the correspondence to the House. The correspondence disclosed that Secretary Seward had transmitted a copy of the resolution to our minister to France with the explanation that—

This is a practical and purely executive question and the decision of its constitutionality belongs not to the House of Representatives or even to Congress, but to the President of the United States.

After a protracted struggle, evidently accompanied with much feeling, the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution, which had been reported by Mr. Henry Winter Davis from the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy, not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law.

That is not the entire resolution. Before I read the remainder of it, permit me to say that the House, before it was voted upon, divided this resolution at the point at which I have just concluded reading. A vote was had first upon that portion of the resolution which I have read. It was adopted by the House, as I remember, by a vote of 119 to 8. The remainder of the resolution was submitted to another vote and was also adopted, but by a smaller majority.

The second part of the resolution was as follows:

And the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition, while pending and undetermined, is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign power. * * *

The joint resolution of 1898 declaring the intervention of the United States to remedy conditions existing in the island of Cuba is recent history and familiar to all. This resolution embodied a clear declaration of foreign policy regarding Cuba as well as a declaration of war. It passed both branches of Congress and was signed by the President.

After reciting the abhorrent conditions, it reads as follows:

Resolved, etc., First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that this administration did warn American citizens to leave Mexico for their safety and to avoid international complications.

President Wilson might have accepted the adoption of the resolution warning American citizens not to travel upon armed merchantmen at this time as an indorsement of his policy in Mexico. He certainly did not regard it as an abject relinquishment of the sacred rights of American citizens to order them to abandon their property and to seek the shelter of the home country in order to avoid the responsibility of protecting them in their rights in Mexico. I believe he was right in pursuing that course. It was a small sacrifice on the part of the few to preserve the peace of the Nation.

But, Mr. President, how much less sacrifice is requires for our citizens to refrain from travel on armed belligerent ships! Or, as pointed out by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] in the course of the discussion recently, what is the difference in spirit in withholding a passport by act of Congress and the letter of the Department of State of October 4, 1915, which said:

The department does not deem it appropriate or advisable to issue passports to persons who contemplate visiting belligerent countries merely for pleasure, recreation, touring, or sight-seeing.

It would hardly be practicable, if it were lawful, to inquire and to distinguish as to all the varying motives which prompt the many thousands of people who travel abroad.

Whatever power the State Department exercises regarding this or any other matter is such and only such as is conferred upon it by act of Congress.

And now, Mr. President, having satisfied myself that, in so far as the warning resolutions had any bearing upon the conduct of foreign affairs or rights of diplomacy, they were entirely proper, and in no way an infringement upon Executive prerogative, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these resolutions were on other grounds entirely within the legislative power of Congress under the Constitution.

It is notable that in the exercise of its authority under the commerce clause the Senate rejected the convention with Prussia and other States of the Germanic Associations of Customs and Commerce. The reasoning quite turns the tables if applied to the controversy in which we are engaged. Mr. Rufus Choate submitted the report from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, from which I quote:

Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is indisputably that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress. They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the representatives of the people, sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly, may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes and rejects than is within the competence of the Executive department of the Government.

To follow, not to lead; to fulfill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect, by negotiation and compact with foreign Governments, the legislative will when it has been announced, upon the great subjects of trade and revenue; not to interpose with controlling influence; not to go forward with too ambitious enterprise—these seem to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive.

Sustaining the view set forth in this report, the Senate laid the treaty on the table.

Clearly a law might be enacted prohibiting American citizens from traveling upon armed merchantmen that would come within the power of Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Congress has enacted numerous laws in the interest of the safety of passengers. The seaman's law, for example, is in point, as well as the law that steamships carrying certain high explosives are required not to take passengers, and so a long list of other laws might be cited.

It is certainly plain, Mr. President, that it would have been entirely within the province of Congress to have gone much further than merely to warn its citizens. No one could question that Congress might legislate on this subject. For example, a joint resolution or bill might be passed to the effect that the protection provided for in section 2000 of the Revised Statutes should not be accorded to any citizen, whether native born or naturalized, while traveling on an armed vessel of a belligerent country during the present European war. Congress might refuse to consider such legislation, and the President might veto it if passed by Congress, still there would be no more reason why the President should object to the introduction and consideration of such a measure than for his protesting against measures proposing disarmament or embargo or any other policy that might arouse conflicting emotions in the belligerent nations.

Sir, I am bound to believe that a more thorough and exhaustive review of all the authorities and precedents will convince all concerned that Congress has still ample power to advise and legislate for the safety and protection of our citizens far beyond what has yet been proposed.

Mr. President, I have been moved by my convictions to submit these observations at this time. I believe it to be vital to the safety and perpetuity of this Government that Congress should assert and maintain its right to a voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States.

And, sir, there is a larger international aspect of this question, with its accompanying responsibility, that can not be shirked or ignored. Across the water the nations of Europe are giving their lifeblood in a fratricidal struggle, which in its inception the people neither desired nor sanctioned.

And now the plain people, the saner people of the warring countries are organizing. For what? Why, to make sure that never again after this conflict has ceased shall the autocratic heads of European Governments have it in their power, through secret diplomacy, to bring on such another world catastrophe.

Democratic control of foreign policies is a basic principle of all organized effort looking for the future establishment of permanent world peace. To this end, throughout the world, leagues of earnest, determined men and women, animated by a common purpose, are formulating plans, based on the provisions by which, in this country, one or both of the legislative branches of Government have a share in the control of international affairs.

Shall we in this crisis of the world's history fail to assert our constitutional rights and by our negligence and default permit the establishment in this country of that exclusive Executive control over foreign affairs that the people of Europe are now repenting amid the agonies of war?

Mr. President, there never was a time in history when it was more fundamentally important that we preserve intact the essential principle of democracy on which our Government is founded—that the will of the people is the law of the land.

Mr. COLT and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, I interrupted the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] the other day in the course of his able speech, and I merely wish to say a few words now in support of the position I then took.

Mr. President, it is a settled rule of international law that merchant ships armed for defense only are as much entitled to warning before destruction as unarmed merchant ships; and hence the proposal by Germany to sink all armed merchant ships without warning is a violation of international law.

The real question, then, which is involved in the proposition to warn Americans not to travel on armed merchant ships is whether the United States as a neutral nation should concede to Germany the right to alter a settled rule of international law under the existing circumstances.

Germany bases her right to change the law mainly upon the ground that changed conditions in modern warfare owing to the invention of the submarine justify such action.

This position is manifestly unsound, because if a belligerent has the legal right under international law to change existing rules by reason of changed conditions it becomes the legal duty of neutrals to submit to all violations of international law which the belligerent may commit in the enforcement of this legal right. It follows, then, that any new invention in the art of war, or any substantial change of any character in conditions, such as increased facilities for transportation whereby commerce is more readily carried on between neutral and belligerent countries, or the increased size of merchant ships whereby the right of search at sea becomes more difficult, constitutes a justification for the violation by a belligerent of existing rules of international law, no matter how injurious this may be to the rights of neutrals.

Again, if we concede to Germany the right of altering the rules of international law upon the ground of changed conditions, we must concede the same right to Great Britain, France, Russia, Italy, Japan, and Turkey, since to concede this right to one belligerent and to deny it to the other belligerents would manifestly be an unneutral act because it would be granting a concession or favor to one which was not granted to others.

In our note of October 21, 1915, the charges against Great Britain for the violation of the rules relating to neutral commerce are summarized under 35 separate heads. Great Britain's justification for these alleged violations is based mainly upon changed conditions in this war. Hence if we concede that Germany is right in her contention, Great Britain has a perfect legal answer to our charges; in other words, Great Britain stands entirely justified in modifying existing rules relating to the right of search, blockade, and conditional contraband such as foodstuffs.

The truth of the matter is that changed conditions, self-preservation, and retaliation are simply the excuses which are urged by belligerents for modifying existing rules of international law, and if the United States as a great neutral power admits the legal validity of these excuses the result would be the entire destruction of neutral rights.

It is clear, therefore, that Germany's contention, if it prevails, involves the surrender of a vital principle which lies at the very foundation of the law of nations.

Mr. President, international law is a body of customary and conventional rules which are legally binding upon each member of the family of nations. This body of laws relate to the conduct of civilized States in their intercourse with one another during peace and during war. The rules relating to war and the rules relating to peace are equally binding, and the rules relating to war are equally binding upon belligerents and neutrals. To say that in time of war these rules are binding upon neutrals and not upon belligerents is subversive of every principle of justice and is fatal to the whole system of international law.

Again, the present war has demonstrated that if we should incorporate into international law as broad legal rules the right to alter the existing law by reason of changed conditions or on grounds of self-preservation or retaliation, then, indeed, not only treaties but the whole body of customary rules representing the growth of centuries would become mere scraps of paper.

Mr. President, in this world crisis the United States stands alone as the great neutral power, and she stands amidst the ruins of international law. We are charged with the highest duty that ever fell to a great people—the preservation for humanity and civilization of the law of nations; and this most difficult undertaking can only be accomplished by holding firmly to the basic principle that the belligerent nations must conform their conduct to the fundamental rules of international law in force at the outbreak of the war. Not only is this the only course of action befitting this great Republic, but it is also our surest safeguard against war.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the American public is so intensely interested just now in our international relations that the time seems opportune for reply to some phases of the speech made by ex-Senator Root in New York on the 15th of last month.

I shall leave to others better qualified the general refutation of his arraignment of the Democratic Party and its leader, President Wilson, but I can not refrain from calling attention to a silence on his part, which speaks volumes, and under the circumstances is indefensible. In that speech Mr. Root took occasion to excoriate the foreign policy of the present administration first in regard to the European situation and then in regard to Mexico, but he said nothing whatsoever about our foreign policy relating to South and Central America.

At the present time the most interesting matters in the foreign policy of the United States may be separated into three divisions—first, our relations with Europe; second, our relations with Mexico; third, our relations with South and Central America.

Surely the distinguished ex-Senator from New York has not overlooked the third in his search for examples of the incompetence and ineptitude of Democrats in general and President Wilson in particular. Why has he not covered the subject thoroughly and expressed his opinion of our dealings with our South and Central American neighbors? Can it be that he has overlooked this point, or is his silence due to the fact that he so thoroughly agrees with the Pan American policy of Mr. Wilson's administration that he can find nothing in it to criticize? Perhaps he is acting on the principle "If I can not speak evil, I will not speak at all."

During his term as Secretary of State Mr. Root posed as the special advocate of closer and more friendly relations between ourselves and the great continent to the south of us. On board a war vessel he made a tour of South America and was feted and entertained everywhere as the bearer of a message of mutual friendship to all the Americas.

Senator Root therefore felt himself estopped from criticizing the administration in this respect, for President Wilson and his Democratic associates have preached and practiced far more effectively than Mr. Root ever dreamed of the doctrine of Pan Americanism which he had advocated.

Realizing that he could speak nothing but good of President Wilson in reference to his South American policy, Mr. Root sealed his lips on that subject; but politics demanded that he launch a vituperative attack against Democrats and that the administration policies be crucified, even at the expense of truth and fair play, and his address, with its high sounding words and careful omission of these very important truths, was a political harangue pure and simple, and not the utterances of a great statesman.

In the course of his remarks the distinguished ex-Senator undertook, as a self-constituted judge and jury, to arraign, try, and convict the administration for not protesting against the invasion of Belgium, alleging that "this Government appeared as approving the treatment of that country."

Far be it from me to defend the crushing of Belgium by Germany. I regard it as one of the saddest events in all history, and, in common with millions of Americans, my heart goes out in deepest sympathy to that unfortunate people. It was not for us, however, in violation of our wise historic policy, to meddle in European affairs. The ex-Senator from New York can not impress upon the United States its obligation to rescue every nation that is in distress, and he can not convince the great body of Americans that such is our duty.

The United States was not a party to the solemn convention of November 15, 1831, signed by Great Britain, Austria, France, Russia, Prussia, and Belgium, guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium. That treaty was purely a European affair and arose out of the mutual fears of the high contracting parties that one of them might gain some advantage over the others by using Belgium as a seat of operations. The breach or enforcement of this so-called "scrap of paper" was a matter with which the United States had no concern, in so far as it is affected by its treaty obligations.

The invasion of Belgium was not a breach of The Hague convention that was signed by the United States, because that agreement referred to neutral nations—that is, nations not engaged in war—and the obligations it imposed in regard to invasion had nothing to do with a nation neutralized by special agreement between conflicting powers, which was the legal effect of the treaty of 1831, which the United States did not sign. After the issuing of the German ultimatum to Belgium, coupled with its conditional declaration of war, Belgium, in the eyes of The Hague convention, became a belligerent, and its invasion was not the invasion of a neutral country, though it was the invasion of a country neutralized by special treaty between interested powers. These signatory powers have a right to complain, but the United States has not, and whatever our feelings may be on the subject it is not our duty as a nation to protest against the breach of a treaty to which we are not a party. Such an act would be especially unjustifiable when we know that it would probably drag us into the maelstrom of a frightful European war.

In this connection let me quote a striking paragraph from an article by ex-President Roosevelt, which appeared in the Outlook of September 23, 1914:

A delegation of Belgians has arrived to invoke our assistance. What action our Government can or will take, I know not.

It has been assumed that no action can be taken that will interfere with our neutrality. It is certainly eminently desirable that we should remain entirely neutral and nothing but urgent need would warrant breaking our neutrality and taking sides one way or the other.

Of course, it would be folly to jump into the gulf ourselves to no good purpose, and very probably nothing we could have done would have helped Belgium. We have not the smallest responsibility for what has befallen her, and I am sure that the sympathy of this country for the suffering of the men, women, and children of Belgium is very real.

Nevertheless, this sympathy is compatible with full acknowledgment of the unwisdom of uttering a single word of official protest unless we are prepared to make that protest effective, and only the clearest and most urgent national duty would ever justify us in deviating from our rule of neutrality and noninterference.

These words were uttered by Mr. Roosevelt, and we know the high opinion in which Mr. Root has always held him.

Ex-President Taft, with praiseworthy impartiality, said, in his speech at Morristown, N. J.:

While I sympathize with the Belgians in this war, whose country, without any fault of theirs, has been made its bloody center, I approve and commend to the full the attitude of President Wilson.

We are not sitting as judges of issues between countries in Europe in this great war. We are seeking to maintain strict neutrality, and until our decision is involved with an agreement to abide by our judgment and recommendation for settlement, we need not embroil ourselves by official expressions of criticisms or approval of the acts of the participants in the war. This is not only the wisest course for us to pursue in maintaining an attitude that may give us influence in promoting mediation when mediation is possible, but it will help us to avoid being drawn into the war.

These are the expressions of two ex-Presidents of the United States.

There is, Mr. President, a peculiar inconsistency when Senator Root protests against what he professes to regard as a violation of a treaty made by the United States. If a breach by us of any treaty obligations in regard to Belgium has been committed, which I deny, it does not lie in the mouth of ex-Senator Root, of all men, to protest against it. Was he not the public defender and apologist of the rape of Panama by the United States? Has he not in public addresses attempted to justify the flagrant violation of our solemn convention with our weak sister Colombia, and that ruthless disregard of her sovereign rights?

The United States, by the treaty of 1846 with Colombia, in consideration of free passage over the Isthmus of Panama, guaranteed in the most explicit and unequivocal manner to preserve the neutrality of Panama, and to maintain over it the sovereignty of Colombia, a treaty as binding upon us as the Belgium neutralization convention of 1831—the so-called "scrap of paper"—was upon Germany and the other powers which signed it.

About the middle of the nineteenth century, when the time arrived to develop our priceless yet remote territory on the Pacific coast, it became necessary for us to appeal to Colombia, then called New Granada, for a free passage through her limits to California, the golden land, which otherwise could only be reached by a nine months' voyage around the Horn, or by the even more dangerous wagon trail across the Rocky Mountains and the western desert. The all-important advantage of a shorter route we secured through a "treaty of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce," negotiated in 1846, in which it was stipulated as follows:

The Government of New Granada guarantees to the Government of the United States that the right of way or transit across the Isthmus of Panama upon any modes of transportation which now exist, or that may be hereafter constructed, shall be open and free to the Government and citizens of the United States, and for the transportation of any articles of lawful commerce belonging to the citizens of the United States.

As a compensation for that privilege, priceless at that time, the United States promised—as an especial compensation for the said advantages, and for the favors that they have acquired by the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of this treaty—

Articles which secure to the United States reciprocal privileges of importation and tonnage dues and equal customs duties—

the United States guarantee, positively and efficaciously, to New Granada, by the present stipulation, the perfect neutrality of the beforementioned isthmus, with the view that the free transit from the one to the other sea may not be interrupted or embarrassed in any future time while this treaty exists; and, in consequence, the United States also guarantee, in the same manner, the rights of sovereignty and property which New Granada has and possesses over the said territory.

In the message in which President Polk submitted the treaty in question to the Senate he said in regard to the right of transit thus won: "The importance of this concession to the commercial and political interests of the United States can not be overrated"; and in a special message of February 10, 1847, only two months after the initiation of the treaty, he said:

There does not appear any other effectual means of securing to all nations the advantages of this important passage, but the guaranty of great commercial powers that the Isthmus shall be neutral territory. * * * The guaranty of the sovereignty of New Granada over the Isthmus is a natural consequence of this neutrality. * * * New Granada would not yield this province that it might become a neutral State; and if she should, it is not sufficiently populous or wealthy to establish or maintain an independent sovereignty.

Thus, by the most solemn guaranty known to the family of nations the United States pledged itself, by express contract, to respect and uphold the sovereignty of New Granada over the Isthmus of Panama, a plain duty already due to New Granada under the general principles of international law.

It is unnecessary to go into detail as to the events which led up to the secession of Panama and our recognition of her sovereignty. Suffice it to say that the Colombian Senate refused to ratify a proposed treaty with us in regard to the building of the Panama Canal. A mock revolution was brewing in Panama at the time, which, in the opinion of many persons in this country, and of most of the South American nations, was fomented by the United States.

On November 3, 1903, the revolutionists, representing less than one-tenth of the population of the State of Panama, arose and took possession of the city of Panama, the total death roll being one Chinaman. The report of the success of the revolution was received at Washington at 9.50 p. m. that day, and at 11.18 the same evening orders were wired from Washington directing the commander of the United States Ship Nashville, which was conveniently in the harbor of Colon, to "make every effort to prevent government troops at Colon from proceeding to Panama."

Thus, Mr. President, while the solemn treaty, by which we guaranteed the sovereignty of Colombia over Panama was in full force and effect, the United States issued a military order preventing Colombia from moving her own troops over her own railway from her own Colon to her own Panama, to put down an opera bouffe revolution. The following day, November 4, 1 day, 17 hours, and 41 minutes after the issuing of the insurgent proclamation of independence in the city of Panama, the United States recognized Panama as a sovereign and independent nation, and shortly thereafter practically threatened Colombia with war if she dared to invade Panama in an attempt to regain her lost sovereignty.

Mr. BORAH. Will I interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. RANSDELL. Not a bit.

Mr. BORAH. I am very much interested in the Senator's discussion of this subject. I have been endeavoring in executive session for the last six months to get leave to discuss this subject in the open. I am afraid the Senator is trespassing upon one of the sacred customs of the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I do not think I am. I am simply trying to explain the conditions connected with what I conceive to be our violation of the binding treaty of 1846 between this country and Colombia, and in order that my explanation may be clear I must state how the violation occurred. In the very next sentence I will draw the conclusion and show that the man of all men who defended the violation of that treaty was ex-Senator Root, of New York, then Secretary of War. I do not propose to discuss the pending Colombian treaty. I have simply stated the facts. Now I lead up to the conclusion therefrom. I would be delighted to discuss that treaty at any time, in open Senate or otherwise, with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I am not assuming to match wits or argument with the Senator. I am exceedingly pleased that the Senator is establishing a precedent. I am glad to have his assistance in discussing these things in the open. I think it is a good precedent.

Mr. RANSDELL. If it be a precedent, I am very glad that I have set one, which I hope the Senator from Idaho will follow.

Mr. BORAH. I have been trying to lead, but I will follow hereafter.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, history records no more high-handed proceeding than this. The United States, which had guaranteed the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus, forcibly prevented her from taking the slightest precautionary or repressive measures against secession, and then capped the climax by immediately recognizing the independence of the seceding Province. This was in violation of all principles of common justice and international law and in direct contravention of the solemn convention of 1846.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Did not the Senator from Louisiana vote for the Nicaraguan treaty?

Mr. RANSDELL. I did.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator understand that the present Government of Nicaragua was established through the armed intervention of the United States, and that the only support that that Government has in Nicaragua at the present time are the warships and the marines of the United States?

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not know that that is a fact, but if it be, it has no bearing upon the question at issue here.

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to say that if we established a Government in Nicaragua which has no support in public opinion in Nicaragua, and is, in fact, not representative of the people of Nicaragua, will not the same question hereafter arise with our reference to a canal right in Nicaragua that arises now with reference to Panama?

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, when we reach that question I shall be very glad to discuss it with the Senator, but I do not propose now to be carried away from the discussion of the inconsistency of ex-Senator Root by taking up the question of Nicaragua, which I conceive to be entirely foreign to the issue.

Mr. BORAH. I will not insist upon the Senator discussing the inconsistency of anyone but ex-Senator Root to-day. I take it other inconsistencies may more appropriately come later.

Mr. RANSDELL. I shall be glad to take them up with the Senator at some other time.

On November 18, 15 days after the revolution broke out, we signed a treaty with the Republic of Panama giving us the Canal Zone and the right to build the canal. The deed was consummated.

Like Germany, we had made a solemn and binding treaty; like Germany, we had contemptuously cast it aside when our self-interest demanded it. The United States marines guarded the trans-Isthmian railroad and prevented Colombia's 500 troops from moving from Colon to Panama to stamp out the insurrection; and when the Colombian commander expressed resentment at this treatment the guns of he U. S. S. Nashville frowned ominously upon the camp of the Colombians. Like Germany, the armed forces of a great nation threatened a weaker power; like Germany, we would have struck, and struck hard, and would have shed the blood of those whose territory we had covenanted to protect and whose sovereignty we had bound ourselves to uphold if the Colombians had not yielded. And why? In order that we might lay our hands on territory the neutrality and sovereignty of which we had pledged ourselves to maintain.

One of the ablest and foremost apologists of our trampling upon the rights of this weak sister State was Elihu Root, then Secretary of War of the United States. In an address before the Union League of Chicago, on February 22, 1904, one month after his resignation from the Cabinet, and less than four months after the events narrated, Mr. Root seriously laid down the following remarkable doctrine:

By the rules of right and justice universally recognized among men and which are the law of nations, the sovereignty of Colombia over the Isthmus of Panama was qualified and limited by the right of the other civilized nations of the earth to have the canal constructed across the Isthmus and to have it maintained for their free and unobstructed passage.

And later he adds:

I have no question that our right and duty were to build the canal, with or without the consent of Colombia.

By these extraordinary statements, which he failed to fortify or sustain by reference to any authority, human or divine, Mr. Root seems to expound the doctrine of international eminent domain in favor of a majority of the nations of the world against any particular one. His unequivocal language can be interpreted in no other way. According to him, for the good of the other civilized nations, it was our right and duty to build the canal, with or without the consent of Colombia.

A more unreasonable and unwarranted statement could not have been made; and I am at a loss to understand how Mr. Root, even in a desperate attempt to justify an indefensible act, could have affronted the intelligence of his audience by such a proposition.

Eminent domain is the right of a sovereign power to take private property for public use upon the payment of just compensation. It is an attribute of sovereignty and exists independent of any constitutional provision.

A nation, however, is supreme only within its own boundaries, and therefore can exercise the sovereign power of eminent domain only within those bounds. It can exert no control over the territory of another sovereign nation; its power in this respect has no extraterritorial effect.

An examination of the leading authorities on international law fails to disclose the slightest intimation of the existence of anything like a law of international eminent domain; on the contrary, the proposition is affirmed and reaffirmed that each sovereign nation has entire and exclusive control over its own territory. The existence of such a law is diametrically opposed to the principles underlying the foundation of organized, independent Governments. Mr. Root's assertion that the United States had the right, and it was its duty, to take the Isthmus for the use of the civilized world, with or without the consent of Colombia, must, therefore, be regarded as empty words. It is merely a statement that might is right.

But even if we admit, for the sake of argument, that the doctrine of international eminent domain applies, then to what conclusion would we be driven?

The Supreme Court of the United States has held that by the general law of Europe and the common law of England it was a qualification of the right of eminent domain that just compensation should be made for property taken for public use; and that the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, merely established this principle beyond legislative control.

If, therefore, the United States, as claimed by Mr. Root, took the Isthmus of Panama by virtue of its rights and obligations as a member of the family of nations, and for the benefit of the civilized world, then by all the rules of law and justice it was bound to make just compensation for the property so taken. Just as the Government must reimburse the private landowner for the value of the property expropriated, so also, under Mr. Root's own theory carried to its logical conclusion, is the United States obliged to pay Colombia the reasonable value of the Canal Zone. And this act of simple justice we have persistently refused to perform.

All through the long years since 1903, Colombia has pleaded with the United States for redress of her wrongs. She realized her inability to accomplish anything by force against a Nation so much more powerful than herself, and asked that all differences between her and the United States be referred to The Hague tribunal or any other court of arbitration. During his incumbency as Secretary of State, from 1905 to 1909, Mr. Root negotiated many treaties of arbitration, yet he opposed granting to Colombia that right which the Constitution guarantees to the humblest citizen of the Union—the right to have his claims adjudicated by an impartial tribunal. Nor during his six years in the Senate did he ever raise his powerful voice in favor of giving Colombia a day in court.

How can Mr. Root blow hot and cold at the same time? How can he in one breath condone, aye, justify, the breaking by the United States of its binding international convention with Colombia, and defend the ruthless, sweeping aside of the sovereign rights of that sovereign power, and in the next breath flay the Democratic administration because it did not protest against the violation by Germany of its treaty with Belgium—a treaty to which the United States was not a party. It does not lie in his mouth to speak on this subject. Surely with his record his tongue should be forever silent upon questions of national honor. Mr. Root should be the last one to raise the question of the violation of treaty obligations. But the mental somersault he performed is not at all remarkable when we remember that upon the eve of a great presidential campaign, it is always in order for good Republicans to make attacks, fair or unfair, just or unjust, upon Democrats.

The Senate of the United States, after prolonged negotiations, now has before it a treaty of redress with Colombia, which, if ratified, will heal the wounds, to the making of which Mr. Root was a party. And although it is not my purpose to address the Senate now on the Colombian treaty, let me say that every consideration of national honor and commercial advancement demands that it be ratified at once.

Colombia is weak and believes with her whole heart and soul that we have grievously wronged her. We refused her insistent requests for arbitration, and the President then negotiated the pending treaty. Can we afford to reject it, even if the justice of Colombia's claims be denied? Can we pursue a course that will injure our country very seriously in a business way, that will make an enemy of Colombia and possibly other States south of us, and that will leave a stain upon our reputation in the opinion of nearly every Latin American? Unquestionably we can not.

The world is aghast at the awful spectacle of the war in Europe, and we are destined to play a great part in helping to solve its problems and secure relief for its victims. Let us keep our own escutcheon clean, without blot or stain or even the shadow thereof, and continue to perform our mission of big brother to mankind without fear or favor and with no apprehension of reproach for any of our national acts. Let us thrust aside the obstacle which alone prevents the full realization of a united North, South, and Central America.

Toward this end President Wilson's administration has been working in and out of season. Its South and Central American policy, in which Mr. Root could find nothing to attack, has been dictated by the highest and most praiseworthy motives, and has borne good fruit, beyond the expectation of its advocates.

What has been the Latin-American policy of Democrats and what has it accomplished?

President Wilson in a remarkable address before the Southern Commercial Congress, during the first year of his tenure of office, on October 27, 1913, sounded the keynote which must have touched a responsive chord in the heart of every American on the two continents, when, referring to our Latin-American neighbors, he said:

> We must prove ourselves their friends and champions upon terms of equality and honor. You can not be friends upon any other terms than upon those of equality. You can not be friends at all except upon the terms of honor. We must show ourselves friends by comprehending their interest, whether it squares with our own interest or not.
> I want to take this occasion to say that the United States will never again seek one additional foot of territory by conquest. She will devote herself to showing that she knows how to make honorable, fruitful use of the territory she has, and she must regard it as one of the duties of friendship to see that from no quarter are material duties made superior to human liberty and national opportunity. I say this not with a single thought that anyone will gainsay it, but merely to fix in our consciousness what our real relationship with the rest of America is. It is the relationship of a family of mankind, devoted to the development of true constitutional liberty. We know that that is the soil out of which the best enterprise springs. We know that this is the cause which we have in common with our neighbors, because we have had to make it for ourselves.

Since then, with this solemn enunciation by President Wilson of our lofty and fixed principles as a sacred pledge to all the world, the present Democratic administration by its wise and farseeing Latin-American policy has recreated and revivified the spirit of Pan American Union, confidence, and friendship.

The Monroe doctrine had been misunderstood by our neighbors. It puts us in the attitude of a protector to our Latin brethren against European aggression; but protection implies dependence, and that idea is irritating to a proud and chivalrous people. With reference to this, President Wilson in his address to Congress, December 7 last, said:

> It was always difficult to maintain such a rôle without offense to the pride of the peoples whose freedom of action we sought to protect and without provoking serious misconceptions of our motives, and every thoughtful man of affairs must welcome the altered circumstances of the new day in whose light we now stand, when there is no claim of guardianship or thought of wards, but instead a full and honorable association as of partners between ourselves and our neighbors, in the interest of all America, North and South. * * * All the Governments of America stand, so far as we are concerned, upon a footing of genuine equality and unquestioned independence.

These convictions have long been held by myself. Addressing the great City Club, of Boston, more than a year ago, on the anniversary of Lincoln's birthday, February 11, 1915, I said:

> Let us invoke the spirit of Lincoln to aid in founding a greater Union that will embrace every foot of American soil from the North Pole to the Straits of Magellan. In essaying this mighty task it would be wise for citizens of the United States not to speak hereafter of the Monroe doctrine, but to substitute in lieu thereof the American doctrine of "America for the Americans," and to have it enforced by a strong alliance of every country on this hemisphere. The cardinal principle of this union should be that the independence of every member State must be guaranteed and its territorial sovereignty preserved from conquest or involuntary acquisition by any country, foreign or American.

Secretary of State Robert Lansing, addressing the momentous Pan American Scientific Congress, which met here December 27 last, as the representative of the administration, stated:

> The ambitions of this Republic do not lie in the path of conquest, but in the paths of peace and justice. Whenever and wherever we can we will stretch forth a hand to those who need help. If the sovereignty of a sister Republic is menaced from overseas, the power of the United States and, I hope and believe, the united power of the American Republics will constitute a bulwark which will protect the independence and integrity of their neighbor from unjust invasion or aggression. The American family of nations might well take for its motto that of Dumas's famous musketeers, "One for all; all for one."

These principles have constituted the foundation and very heart of the dealings of this administration with our Latin brethren. They are the doctrines of Pan Americanism in its very truest expression. They found form and substance in the gathering in this city of the brightest minds of the American Continents in the First Pan American Financial Conference, held in May, 1915. They found expression in the Pan American Scientific Congress of December and January last, attended by the representatives of 21 independent and sovereign nations, which, imbued with a splendid spirit of unity and fraternity, discussed questions of the deepest moment to all the Americas. They have been visualized in the extension and expansion of commerce between the United States and Central and South America.

Never has the powerful voice of the press of these countries borne so friendly a tone to the United States as now. The efforts of this administration have almost entirely eradicated the suspicion with which we were formerly regarded. There has grown up between the people of the two continents a genuine feeling that we are brothers—brothers in every sense of the word; that the interest of one is the interest of all; and that it is especially necessary now, in view of the discord across the seas, that all Americans should stand together for a united America.

These are the splendid benefits which have come from the Latin American policy of President Wilson and the Democratic administration. These are the things to which Senator Root resolutely closed his lips, though no eyes saw them more clearly than his. Partisan politics shackled his tongue and warped his sense of justice. Can one who was silent on so important a subject because if he spoke at all it would necessarily have been in terms of praise, hope to have his words on other points carry conviction? His silence is tantamount to suppression of truth on a great foreign policy. It was unworthy of his high character and mighty intellect.

During the delivery of Mr. RANSDELL'S speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The Senator from Louisiana will kindly suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1417) to erect a factory for the manufacture of armor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair hear any objection? The Chair hears none. The unfinished business is temporarily laid aside, and the Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. RANSDELL'S speech,

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harding	Myers	Sheppard
Brandegee	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Broussard	James	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Catron	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Smoot
Chilton	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver	Sutherland
Clapp	Jones	Overman	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Phelan	Thompson
Cummins	Lane	Ransdell	Walsh
Curtis	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Warren
Dillingham	McCumber	Robinson	Williams
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY]. He is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. These announcements may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1053) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado.

ARMED MERCHANT SHIPS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the rights of neutrals on the high seas are clearly defined by the principles of international law. They have been the subject of much and of frequent controversy since the present war began. Great Britain, Germany, and Austria have been charged with repeated infractions of these rights, and protests have been registered against one or more of them by virtually all of the neutral nations. These infractions have not, generally speaking, been categorically denied. Rather have they been explained or defended as due to the exigencies of warfare, the development of the submarine, and to a campaign of reprisals made necessary by mutual violations of hitherto accepted methods of marine warfare.

The recently announced determination of Germany to make war upon all enemy vessels without regard to their character or armament, because her submarines, at once the most formidable and most helpless engines of marine destruction ever devised by the malign genius of man, might otherwise be at the mercy of merchantmen armed for defense as permitted by the laws of maritime warfare, and warning neutrals from such craft has precipitated a crises in America, fraught with possible serious consequences. That this attitude is opposed to a right as old as international law itself is not vigorously disputed. That the causes underlying its recognition and establishment have disappeared, and that the law itself should therefore not be longer observed may, perhaps, be successfully maintained; but for a belligerent to declare or assume in a time of war that the rule is obsolete and then proceed upon its own declaration, is not only indefensible in principle but establishes a most perilous precedent. Any action of ours which involves an admission of the right to do this, or acquiescence in its assertion even under protest, can not, in my opinion, be safely done or seriously considered.

Nor, Mr. President, am I able to concur in the view either that because the character and structure of the submarine are incompatible with the practice of defensive armament, or that because piracy and privateering have disappeared from the high seas thereby making its exercise needless, the right of search, seizure, and capture with due regard to the lives of passengers and of crew, and the rights of neutrals to the carriage of person and of goods in unarmed enemy vessels should therefore be abridged or disregarded. Until such rights shall have been modified or abrogated by the deliberate consensus of maritime nations they should be observed and respected. The law of nations was not born yesterday. Its code of rules was designed far more for times of war than of peace. It is a combination of precept and of custom born of the experiences and the needs of the past, and crystallized into essential rules of action and of restraint by the common sense of justice and the common consent of civilized communities. It may be true that its provisions yield to the strain of great human crises at times when they are most needed, and that the experiences of recurring conflicts require the reform and remolding of many of its rules, but it is obviously true that they can not without great danger to the peace of neutrals, and therefore to the very fabric of civilization, be altered or set aside in times of war as the purposes or the advantage of belligerents may suggest. And to us, the only first-class power still removed from the deadly circuit of war, is committed the duty in our own, and the interests of all the world, to maintain these rules and protest against their disregard by any or all belligerents. It is this duty which the American administration has steadfastly and constantly recognized and sought to discharge.

Mr. President, the reasons for formulating and establishing a rule may cease. But the rule itself must endure as an active principle of human conduct so long as its recognition is essential to justice and humanity. If that be true, every condition which required its adoption may have wholly disappeared, and yet the rule remains. Such, in my judgment, is the right of the neutral to the freedom of the seas, as defined and restricted by the law of nations. I think it well, therefore, to consider some of the consequences which must in the very nature of things result from its violation or abandonment.

An enemy vessel, whatever its description, is subject to capture. A neutral merchant vessel is subject to search, and to seizure if carrying contraband of war. If the one forcibly resists capture or the other forcibly resists search, the enemy may meet force with force, whatever the consequence to crew or to passengers may be. But when captured or seized, the lives of passengers and crew must be respected. They must be carried into port somewhere and there discharged or detained, as the given circumstances may justify. This can be safely done when, and only when, they are taken on board the captor vessel or when a prize crew from the captor vessel is detailed to take charge of the prize. The case of the British steamer Appam is the latest instance of such a practice.

A submarine crew, however, hardly equals, and, I think, seldom exceeds, the number of men needed for such a duty. Hence the detail of a prize crew by a submarine is virtually impossible. And the boat itself is too small to permit of any sensible increase of its personnel. Hence the transfer of prisoners to its own decks is impossible. The capture of an enemy merchantman by a submarine must, therefore, have one of these results: She must be sunk with all on board, or her inmates must attempt to launch and occupy her lifeboats before the sinking occurs. The ghastly experiences of the Lusitania, the Arabic, and the Ancona demonstrate the tragic futility of such a terrible alternative. War at sea thus waged surpasses Sherman's graphic characterization of war in general.

I do not think that the right of a merchantman to arm for defense against sea craft floating upon the surface, or, to be more specific, against all manner of sea craft save submarines, has yet been challenged. The complaint is directed solely to the advantage which such merchantman, if armed, is said to possess over a submarine, whose shell is easily pierced and whose armament consists mainly of torpedoes. The vulnerability of the submarine to attack is, in other words, the reason given for permanently restricting the rights of neutrals at sea.

Its special method of attack, however, makes the submarine the deadliest of all seagoing contrivances, and its ability to navigate below as well as upon the surface gives it a terrible advantage over its most formidable antagonist. If now to these conditions be added the further one, that because it is easily sinkable no enemy merchantman otherwise entitled to arm for defense can as against the submarine arm at all, it becomes the helpless and certain victim of this new method of warfare. This is but to say that in this humane age of torpedo fighting, when it would seem that the merchantman needs arms for defense more than ever, it must strip itself completely of all guns and then await the certain fate which its helpless condition so surely invites. This doctrine, once established, depopulates the ocean in times of war.

Mr. President, the right of a neutral to commit his person and his goods to the custody of an enemy merchantman as he may wish or as his needs require is everywhere conceded. It can not be successfully assailed. The contention that his Government should warn him not to do so lest his destruction involve his country in war may have merits as a matter of policy which I can not perceive. But even so, the monitory action of his Government should be voluntary. We can not admit the duty, whatever the apparent need of doing so, when called upon to exercise it at the behest or because of the warning of a belligerent proposing to violate the right. It is this phase of the pending issue which I think has not received the consideration it deserves. And yet it is one of the vital elements of the pending discussion. Were conditions reversed, it would be conclusive of the situation; for Germany would never yield a jot to this or any other form of compulsion.

Mr. President, I have given much anxious thought to the proposal embodied in the resolutions the discussion of which has recently agitated both ends of the Capitol. I have been impressed by some of the arguments and by the deep and eloquent convictions of their advocates, whose earnestness and whose patriotism are above criticism and beyond reproach. I share their abiding horror of war and their desire to avoid it so long as it can be avoided without impairing the national dignity and the national duty. I believe, with them, that no seemingly trivial cause can justify the interruption of our peaceful relations with any belligerent. I have been eager to discover, with them, some method of avoiding the possibility of collision over the contingency of further destruction of American lives upon the high seas. And I regret that I am altogether unable to accept the propositions embodied in these resolutions as a solution of the difficulty. I am convinced, as the result of long and anxious and deliberate reflection, that instead of effectuating a method of avoiding a crisis the principle embodied in the resolutions would commit the Government to a course of procedure at variance with the conceded law regarding the rights of neutrals at sea, and wholly inconsistent with the attitude it has taken on account of the Lusitania tragedy, and which it has resolutely maintained up to this hour. If I am correct in this view, it would be safer and more satisfactory to retire from our past and present contentions than to act upon the spirit of the resolutions. Let me attempt to demonstrate the justice of my conclusion.

A request or warning by the Government to its citizens to refrain from taking passage upon belligerent merchantmen armed for defense is not the merely cautionary and harmless act which its advocates assert and believe it to be. It must, if issued, be general in its application. It can not well distinguish between those who need not and those whose personal or business exigencies require them to take passage abroad. It would be the official act of the administration, however phrased, and therefore clothed with the importance which authority necessarily imparts. At home and abroad it would be interpreted as an official order, whether issued by the President at his own instance or at the request of Congress. If obeyed by those to whom directed, it would operate as a recognition of Germany's contention of the right to sink enemy merchantmen carrying any sort of guns as completely and effectually as though her warning were formally accepted and acknowledged as law, under the seal of the Republic.

But if disregarded by any citizen who, unmindful of its suggestion, took passage and lost his life through the destruction of the vessel conveying him across the sea, America's demand for disavowal and reparation would be answered by the curt, though conclusive, reminder that she had foreclosed her case by her warning and her citizen had come to his end by his fatuous disobedience of it. Surely this result would follow or the cautionary act would be worse than meaningless. It would be misleading and of no avail. If the warning was not without a sanction, if it was not intended to apprise citizens that their disregard of it would place them beyond the pale of national protection, and they would therefore violate it at their peril, it could have no intelligent nor effective purpose, for if intended merely as an official expression of what individual conduct with regard to belligerent merchantmen should be, leaving every citizen at entire liberty to act in all respects as though the warning had not been given, and with the implied assurance that, whatever his conduct, there would be no diminution of governmental protection, no relaxation of governmental duty or responsibility to him or to the country in the event of disaster, the issuance of the warning would be worse than a blunder. It would approach the dimensions of a great public wrong. It would be to trifle with a momentous national crisis, and possibly be productive of consequences for which we would be largely responsible, and subject us, in the contingency of disaster, to the grave charge of encouraging a belligerent to persist in a policy of marine warfare that we might use it as a pretext for a declaration of hostilities. The most earnest advocate of peace, even of peace at any price, if there be such, desires the development of no such possibilities as an outcome of his country's diplomacy.

But this is not the only vital issue. It becomes important to consider the effect which the proposed policy, if accepted or acquiesced in, will have not only upon other conflicts with international law during the remainder of the war, but upon the body of that law in future. New precedents are sometimes useful, but more often they are dangerous. I am unable to perceive why, if one belligerent may for its own purposes profoundly change the law regarding neutral rights in one direction, another may not therefore change it with equal impunity in another; and no man, however wise, can foresee the tremendous consequences to neutral nations which such departures must produce.

I am no expert upon international law and have less knowledge of diplomacy. In practice, however, both should recognize and observe established conditions, especially when three-quarters of mankind are striving to annihilate each other. Firmness, courage, perseverence, respect for the rights of others, and insistence upon our own, as we are given to understand them, should at this of all times be the cardinal principles of our action. Such a course, as was recently said by the Senator from Idaho, is the only sound as it is the only safe one, and is far more likely to prevent trouble than to incite it. And it is this consideration, Mr. President, which fully justifies the wisdom of investing the Executive with jurisdiction over foreign affairs, with our diplomatic relations, and with practically all other subjects of international concern save the duty of ratifying treaties and declaring war. Power to deal with these mighty affairs must be left somewhere, with the right of practically exclusive control linked with responsibility. A legislative body composed of many men and divided into two houses, however wise and patriotic its members may be, is no fit depository for such authority, since it is difficult to secure prompt and united action and impossible to fix responsibility. This fact is too obvious for discussion. Administrative control of diplomacy and foreign affairs is practically universal. It is a law of political gravitation which may be transiently suspended by artificial interferences, but can never be permanently overcome. Hence I deprecate, with the greatest deference to the views of abler Members of the Senate, the proposition that we should attempt by concurrent resolutions or otherwise to direct the course of the Executive regarding this and kindred subjects. We do not, we can not, know all the facts of which the Executive should be the depository. We can not, strive as we may, wholly eliminate partisanship from our discussions of them. We can not at all times restrict our language to the line of prudent and temperate expression. We are unable to wholly subordinate our individual conceptions of policy or of principle to the requirements of the moment. We are sure to say, as some of us have already said, things that should not receive the sanction of our sober reflection. And we may be still debating when the crisis is reached and has culminated.

Much has been said of the duty and the value of discussing subjects like these in the open Senate. I agree that there is nothing like debate to sustain a truth or confute a falsehood. I approve the view that without it we should cease to be a deliberative body, and thus be deprived of one of our most valuable functions. But, Mr. President, I venture to say in all charity that Senate discussions are not of the commanding importance which they should and would be but for our abuse of the right to debate. I am not able to perceive that subjects which we consider possess any relative merit. We treat them all alike and but with little regard to their comparative importance. We wrangle over a bill for the regulation of a national reserve or to construct a bridge over some navigable stream with as much fervor and as much tedium as a bill for the enlargement of the Navy or the creation of a merchant marine. All is grist that comes to our mill, and the grist is constantly increasing. Time was made for slaves, not for the Senate. Were Tennyson alive, he might well revise his immortal poem by substituting this body for that brook which is said to go on forever. If we had the determination of our international policy, the war would be over before we had fairly begun its outline.

We met in session on the 6th of last December. We have continued the emergency revenue and passed the Philippines bill. For a month we have been wrestling with the general dam bill, and the end has just been reached. Spring is here and summer is coming. We have much to do, but we can do none of it without unanimous consent. Surely the fathers were wise in providing for Executive control of our foreign affairs.

I fully agree that Executive control ends where ours begins; that the power to declare war is with the Congress, where it should be. I fully agree that this is greatest of all powers; that the awful responsibility of its exercise, which I fervently pray may never again occur, rests upon us. I fully agree that we can not in justice to the country or to ourselves exercise it except upon the fullest consideration and with the fullest knowledge. But I can not admit that we are yet face to face with such conditions. And I know that should the crisis come the patient but courageous man in the White House, who thus far through a storm of passion and obloquy and of abuse such as once enveloped the martyred Lincoln, who has been serene and self-contained when others seemed to have lost their judgment and their composure, will convey to us through our committees all the knowledge he possesses and the sources of his acquisition that we may confront our mighty task with intelligence and with satisfaction.

And, Mr. President, we must never forget that whatever he does or we do in this and other crises will be charged or credited to him. Ours may be the mistakes and the errors, but his is the responsibility. We may inveigh against what seem to be Executive encroachments; we may protest against what seem to be interferences with legislative authority; we may resent what seem to be the constantly increasing centralization of power in the Executive, but these things will continue, because the people so decree. They more and more look to the President as their representative; they applaud him in proportion to his assertion of prerogative, his assumption of responsibility, his faculty for leadership, his display of courage, his concern for their well-being. And they fall away from him in proportion as he fails to reach their standards of what a ruler should be. We should be slow, therefore, to exercise any authority which might embarrass, however well intentioned; which might hinder, albeit we desire to help; which might bring failure, though we meant success, for upon his head, not ours, the wrath of the people will descend should we err. Such has it been since we were a Nation; such will it be until the structure of our Government and the character of our people shall undergo a profound transformation.

It was Mr. Calhoun's contention that sovereignty is indivisible. It can not inhere in two or more governing elements. The Nation and States can not both possess it. The attempt to distribute can only result in demonstrating the impossibility of its divided exercise. One or the other must yield in the conflict which the attempted division inevitably produces. This great truth has found demonstration in American history in every contest between the States and the Nation since April, 1861.

It is equally certain that the President and Congress can not concurrently exercise the power to shape the national conduct upon an issue like this which involves the very essence of sovereignty. Joint authority by no means presupposes or secures unity of action. It is the more likely to cause division and dissension. The present condition graphically illustrates the fact. The President has constantly and consistently asserted the rights of neutrals at sea. Prominent Members of the Senate and House, equally conscientious and patriotic, differ from the administration and insist upon a policy which, whatever their views may be and however expressed, will be interpreted by the world as a temporary abandonment of neutral rights at the dictation of a belligerent, which may seriously imperil other equally important principles of international law. But were these gentlemen right and the President wrong, the resultant conflict of opinion officially expressed would be most deplorable. Indeed, its serious consequences can not be overestimated.

The fact, therefore, that the lodgment of authority over this tremendous question with both the executive and legislative branches of the Government never could have been intended by the framers of our Constitution will fully justify, if justification be needed, our acquiescence in the sole responsibility of the Executive.

The makers of the Constitution, after due deliberation, intrusted the executive to a single man. They were convinced that efficiency and responsibility could not be otherwise secured.

Alexander Hamilton, discussing this proposition in the Federalist, said:

> Wherever two or more persons are engaged in any common enterprise or pursuit there is always danger of difference of opinion. If it be a public trust or office, in which they are clothed with equal dignity and authority, there is peculiar danger of personal emulation and even animosity. * * * Men often propose a thing merely because they have had no agency in planning it or because it may have been planned by those who they dislike. But if they have been consulted and have appeared to disapprove, opposition then becomes, in their estimation, an indispensable duty of self-love. * * * No favorable circumstances palliate or atone for the disadvantages of dissension in the executive department. Here they are pure and unmixed. There is no point at which they cease to operate. They serve to embarrass and weaken the execution of the plan or measure to which they relate from the first step to the final conclusion of it. They constantly counteract those qualities in the Executive which are the most necessary ingredients in its composition, vigor and expedition, and this without any counterbalancing good. In the conduct of war, in which the energy of the Executive is the bulwark of the national security, everything would be to be apprehended from its plurality. * * *
> But one of the weightiest objections to a plurality in the Executive is that it tends to conceal faults and destroy responsibility. * * * It often becomes impossible, amidst mutual accusation, to determine on whom the blame or the punishment of a pernicious measure, or a series of pernicious measures, ought really to fall. It is shifted from one to another with so much dexterity and under such plausible appearances that the public opinion is left in suspense about the real author. * * * "I was overruled by my councils. The council was so divided in their opinion that it was impossible to obtain any better resolution on the point." These and similar pretexts are constantly at hand, whether true or false. And who is there that would either take the trouble or incur the odium of a strict scrutiny into the secret springs of the transaction?

The power to declare war is committed to the Congress. This wise provision imposes upon the people's representatives the final word upon the gravest and most important of national alternatives. It rests with us alone. The President may not draw the sword save with our authority, whatever the need may be. His foreign policy may, indeed, influence or possibly control our final action, but this does not justify our undue interference with his authority. That, under our form of government, must be left to that great body of public opinion which, in the last analysis, is really the Government of the United States. It would be as appropriate, in my judgment, for the President to assert the right of jointly exercising with Congress the power to declare war as for the latter body to assert the right to jointly exercise with the Executive authority to conduct our foreign affairs, except as expressly authorized by the Constitution. It may be that this was not the wisest arrangement or division of powers, but I have yet to perceive anything in history or in the inherent merits of the subject which convinces me that some other scheme would have been wiser or more practicable.

Much has been said in this connection about war, its horrors, and the necessity of avoiding it. I shall not dilate upon these obvious conclusions. Nobody disputes them. Nevertheless, the President, although steadfastly striving to avert active hostilities and steer the Nation safely through the constantly increasing perils of a world-wide war, notwithstanding the mutual reproaches and abuse of partisans on either side of the conflict, is charged with desiring to affront a great nation and deliberately provoke it to acts of hostility. While much allowance must be made for expressions falling from the lips of men in times of passion and excitement, I am compelled to protest against utterances which question the motives or reflect upon the purpose of the Executive. As the President of the United States he is to-day the guardian and champion of those principles prescribed by the common consent of civilized mankind for the vindication and protection of neutrals in war. To be otherwise than firm and insistent upon their recognition and enforcement would be to betray justice and become recreant to the cause of humanity. This duty he has thus far performed with an eye single to the welfare of the Nation and with the deepest sense of responsibility to the future. It is my earnest hope and sincere belief that, undaunted and unafraid, he will continue in the performance of his prerogatives and his assertion of the rights of all those nations still happily enjoying the blessings of peace.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday morning the press dispatches contained a statement, as emanating from the Department of State, which reads as follows:

> Seagoing Americans will presently find themselves as effectually warned against passage on armed merchantmen as though this Government had in fact put into force either the Gore or the McLemore resolution.

This declaration from the State Department, bearing the earmarks of authenticity, coupled with the latest answer of the German Government to the contentions of the United States—which indicated the possibility of an understanding being arrived at between the Governments and that the German Government might possibly concede the right of merchantmen armed for defense only to have all of the rights of unarmed merchantmen and be exempt from attack without notice—induced me to withdraw the resolution which I then had pending before the Senate covering this subject.

Since that time, Mr. President, I notice the State Department denies that it has any intention of notifying American people not to travel upon armed liners. But inasmuch as that was not the declaration charged to the State Department, but, rather, that "seagoing Americans will presently find themselves as effectually warned against passage on armed merchantmen as though this Government had in fact put into force either the Gore or the McLemore resolution," I assume that the statement as published was substantially correct. It agrees with other utterances made on the same subject by the State Department. Because of the fact that the Gore resolution was amended in such a way that its meaning was reversed and a motion immediately made to table it, the votes of Senators on the motion gave no indication of their views on the real question uppermost in the minds of the people, whether Americans should refrain from traveling on armed merchant vessels.

Mr. President, this tabling method of disposing of any question, affording no opportunity for an expression of the reasons which guide individual Senators in casting a vote, gives great opportunities for misrepresenting the real issues involved, an opportunity which has been taken advantage of in this "warning" controversy.

It is my purpose to present as briefly and concisely as I may be able to do the real issues which were involved in the resolution now on the table relating to the travel of American citizens on armed belligerent merchant vessels.

There were two, and only two, questions presented. First, is it the moral and patriotic duty of American citizens to refrain from traveling on such ships during the diplomatic controversy between this country and Germany and Austria concerning the declaration of the latter to treat armed belligerent merchant vessels as warships? Second, If it is the duty of American citizens to so act, should Congress or the President request them to refrain from traveling on such ships during the pendency of the negotiations?

The very statement of these two questions invites investigation, and therefore condemns the judgment of anyone who would aver that a difference of opinion on either or both of these problems raises a question of proper loyalty to this country. The patriotic duty of every representative of the United States is not only to look at every great problem squarely in the face, but to present it honestly and accurately.

Here, Mr. President, is the situation which confronts us: The fierce flame of war which is to-day literally devouring Europe has brought into use hundreds of hellish devices and implements of warfare heretofore unused or undreamed of—submarines, aeros, Zeppelins, asphyxiating gases, blinding gases, flaming jets—

> Wi' mare o' horrible and awful
> Which e'en to name would be unlawful.

From out this bewildering maze of new instrumentalities and new methods of warfare the submarine and its uses have been brought into international prominence. The sinking of the Lusitania, an unarmed belligerent merchant vessel, without warning, by a submarine, destroying about 1,100 innocent lives, more than a hundred of whom were American citizens, aroused a just spirit of intense hostility against this act; and this Government met the occasion promptly and vigorously, demanding reparation, so far as that could be done, and that the German Nation should repudiate the action of its submarine commander and pledge itself to desist from any further unlawful acts of that character. Negotiations proceeded, and Germany recognized the American demand, admitted that the sinking of such vessels without notice was improper, assured this country that it would not follow that practice, and promised reparation. It is claimed that in her assurances that she would not again contravene this rule of warfare she did not except merchant ships armed for defense only. However that may be, she now asserts that these armed merchant vessels are, so far as submarines are concerned, offensively armed; that the submarine has the same rights as other warships of visitation and seizure of merchant vessels; and that resisting this right by firing on the submarine which, by reason of its vulnerability, is easily destroyed, this armed merchant vessel should be treated by the submarine as a ship of war; and that therefore it may be fired on without notice by the submarine. And she declares that, so far as submarine warfare is concerned, she will so treat it.

Against this contention of the central powers this country has maintained that by well-established international law a merchant vessel armed for defense only has the status and every right of an unarmed merchant vessel, one of which rights is that while she shall not go out of her way to destroy an enemy warship, she may fire upon one and sink it in self-defense, and that by so doing she does not forfeit her right to be exempt from the fire of a warship without notice or from being sunk without provision for the safety of her passengers and crew. And this Government further insists that neither the vulnerability of the submarine nor any other changed condition of warfare can operate to repeal the international law heretofore obtaining.

There is no question, Mr. President, as to what international law has heretofore been on the subject. The contention of this Government as to what that law has been is correct. There is, however, a question as to whether international law obtaining before a war may be modified by a belligerent during war. While that question is immaterial to the issue now before the Senate, it has a bearing upon the bona fides of the claim put forth by the parties involved in the controversy. I do not agree that international law can not be modified or that some of its requirements may not be changed by a belligerent during the progress of a war. While all of those provisions of international law, founded on justice and humanity, never should be modified or repudiated, there may arise many conditions which, by every principle of right, would justify a nation at war in declining to follow old rules and which would justify the promulgation of new rules to cover new conditions. Every nation at war does that very thing. It must adapt itself, within proper bounds, to new war environments. International law is not statutory. It is neither made by statute nor modified by statute. How, then, is it made and how, then, can it be modified? Why, Mr. President, every international rule pertaining to war is made by one or more of the belligerents in that war. Every modification is made in the same way, and it becomes a rule when it is acquiesced in by the nations generally. If that were not true, then an international rule of war could never be changed.

And, Mr. President, he must be hidebound, indeed, who would deny that the vast changes in warfare brought about by these divers new instrumentalities of destruction, would not work some change in the rules governing the rights, duties, and responsibilities of both neutrals and belligerents. Secretary Lansing himself, during this very controversy, has recognized that new conditions may bring some of the old rules within debatable grounds. But, Mr. President, whether the position taken by the central powers has any element of reasonableness, it is asserted and asserted strongly, and each Government is now engaged in attempting to bring the other to its viewpoint. The matter is still unsettled. It is still a subject of controversy. We are hoping that an agreement will be reached. We are compelled, however, to admit that the situation is still delicate and critical.

Now, what is the bounden duty of American citizens under these particular circumstances and while these negotiations are proceeding? If an armed belligerent passenger vessel is torpedoed by a submarine without notice, and the life of an American citizen is destroyed thereby, that means either a square backdown by one country or the other, or it means war. And, Mr. President, if such an event should occur, neither of them could then back down. With the hot blood that would be immediately engendered on both sides the people of each nation would prevent any retreat.

Now, let me put this question straight to you, Mr. Senator. Would you by your act bring on such a crisis? Would you forestall any possible peaceful settlement of this question by your haste or recklessness? Would you plunge this country into war by your audacity? I know what your answer is. You would not do so. Well, then, if you would not do so, would you be unpatriotic by advising other American citizens, many of whom may fail to see the seriousness of their act as you see it? Assuming even that your legal right and that of other American citizens to travel on armed merchant vessels, was beyond any possible question, would you not feel that it was your patriotic duty to your country to refrain from exercising that right? And if that is your patriotic duty, are you not led by your own logic to admit that to exercise that right at this particular time is therefore unpatriotic? If one course is a patriotic duty, the opposite course must necessarily be unpatriotic. Can you then stand here and insist that it is improper to request an American citizen not to do an unpatriotic thing?

No, Mr. President, you can stand here until doomsday, weaving your fine-spun theories about national honor and pride, but you can never weave a veil so dense as to blind your own eyes as to the duty of every American citizen to refrain from any unnecessary act which would operate to plunge his country into the vortex of this accursed war.

Mr. President, the duty which a nation owes to its people is akin to that which a parent owes to his child. If, in some of these feudal warfares which so often occur in our own country, two leaders with their factions were attempting to destroy each other, and one should declare he would kill any person who should approach within gunshot of his abode, can I answer the obligations of parental duty by saying to my child, "You have the right to go there, and if you get killed I shall avenge your death?" Mr. President, I can not answer the accusations of my own conscience by saying to such child, "You can do as you please." I can not fulfill my duty either to him or to myself unless I advise him to refrain from exercising that right. I would say to him, "While you have the clear right to go there, I am endeavoring to convince this man of the wrongfulness of his threat, and while we are arguing that question, you should not by an unnecessary assertion of your right, bring on a crisis which may not only destroy your own life which can never be returned to you, but is sure to bring another family into this fued and entail great bloodshed."

And, Mr. President, in my humble judgment, that is what Congress ought to say to the American people. By advising my child to refrain from going on dangerous premises I in no way recognize the right of the man making the threat, nor do I weaken the force or effectiveness of my own argument.

Mr. President, I am certain that in these views respecting the plain duty of the American citizen I am voicing the sentiment of practically every Senator and of every thoughtful American citizen who wishes to avoid war. Those who differ with me base their objections on the second proposition. They admit the American citizen ought not to travel on these armed belligerent merchant ships but fear the effect of such advice on the other powers. They fear that such action will be taken by the central powers as an indication of weakness or lack of confidence in the absolute justice of our demands. But the resolution which I introduced was not intended to have that effect, and by its wording it could not be given that construction.

This resolution provided—that while the strict legal right of an American citizen under international law to travel and ship his goods on an armed merchant vessel may be an established right, it is none the less the moral and patriotic duty of every American citizen, in view of the desperate character of the warfare now raging in Europe and the desperate situation of each and all of the warring powers, to refrain from needlessly exposing himself to danger, and, by his recklessness and audacity, involving his country or threatening to involve it in a conflict that may seriously affect the welfare of 100,000,000 of his fellow citizens; and that therefore, the citizens of the United States should * * * refrain from travel on such armed merchant ships until an agreement has been reached between this country and the warring nations, to the end that the endeavors of the President may not be jeopardized or halted or this Government forced into hostilities with another country because of the unnecessary or reckless attitude of any citizen of the United States.

This language surrenders no right which we have insisted upon. It weakens in no way the force of our demands. It is right from a legal standpoint and it is right from a patriotic standpoint.

Mr. President, while I do not believe for a moment that we will get into this war, I nevertheless want to be sure that if war should threaten us it will not be brought about by the act of one of our own citizens. I want the other power to be clearly, wholly, and unquestionably in the wrong. We will then have the Nation united as one man, and such unity of sentiment will, with its own force and power, compel a surrender to our every just demand.

Mr. President, there are different kinds and degrees of patriotism in the world. One finds in the expression, "My country, right or wrong," the limits of patriotic duty. The other, ever striving toward higher ideals of national probity, seeks a better realization in "My country always, but always right."

OSAGE OIL LANDS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask that Table Calendar No. 7, Senate resolution 107, relative to leasing of Osage oil lands, be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done at this time by a motion to proceed to its consideration. There is a bill pending at this time.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the question and then the call will be made. There is another bill pending at this time, and it will be necessary to move to take up for consideration the resolution mentioned by the senior Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator makes that motion. The junior Senator from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson
Bankhead	Gore	McCumber	Sheppard
Beckham	Harding	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Borah	Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Catron	Hollis	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Chilton	Hughes	Norris	Smoot
Clapp	James	O'Gorman	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Oliver	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Owen	Walsh
Colt	Kenyon	Page	Warren
Cummins	Kern	Pittman	Williams
Curtis	Lane	Poindexter

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees to attend.

Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SHAFROTH, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. BRANDEGEE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The senior Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 107.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will state that the consideration of that resolution will require considerable time. It has never been before the Senate for consideration. I feel that, being a local matter, it has not yet received the attention at the hands of Senators which its importance deserves. There are other measures pressing for consideration, measures of national importance, to which the Senate ought at this time to devote its attention. In order that we may proceed to the consideration of those general measures I move to lay the pending motion on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Oklahoma moves that the motion of the senior Senator from Oklahoma be laid on the table. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. GORE. I ask for a division.

There were, on a division—ayes 7, noes 25.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is lost.

Mr. GORE. What was the announcement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was lost.

Mr. GORE. I did not understand the announcement of the division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There were 7 in the affirmative and 25 in the negative.

Mr. GORE. Then a quorum did not vote on the motion to table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter suggested by the inquiry of the Senator from Oklahoma has been decided repeatedly. It is not deemed to be the basis on which an objection can be raised.

Mr. GORE. But less than a quorum voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That does not invalidate the vote.

Mr. GORE. That was not the point. I desire to raise the point of no quorum, in view of the announcement of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Martin, Va.	Shafroth
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Sheppard
Borah	Hughes	Norris	Simmons
Catron	James	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Clark, Wyo.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smoot
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Kenyon	Page	Walsh
Cummins	Kern	Poindexter	Williams
Curtis	Lane	Pomerene
Gallinger	Lea, Tenn.	Reed
Harding	McCumber	Robinson

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present. The Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. SMITH of Michigan entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GORE. In view of the announcement of the Chair, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 11, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 10, 1916.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, our hearts are profoundly moved by the visitation into the congressional home of that strange and mysterious change which we call death. The eyes that looked into ours are closed, the lips that answered to our call are stilled, the hand that clasped ours with warmth and affection responds no more to our touch.

To whom shall those who loved him go but to Thee for consolation and comfort? Thou gavest life and Thou hast taken it away. Enlarge our faith and make bright our hopes that we may be assured that life is stronger than death; that love, the crown of all humanity, lives on forever. The sands of life run swiftly; help us, therefore, to work while it is yet day, for the night cometh when no man can work. May all that was strong, pure, noble in his character be an inspiration to us. And O God, our Father, bring us all at last into one of Thy many mansions, that we may dwell together where love shall be the ruling passion, through Him who taught us the continuity of life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BROWN, OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] has notified the Chair that he can not attend the funeral services of the late Representative BROWN, of West Virginia, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CULLOP, to take his place.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. DANFORTH, by unanimous consent, was given leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of House bill 8087, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, to grant an increase of pension to William Cobb, no adverse report having been made thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 4530. An act for the relief of Michael F. O'Hare;

H. R. 10238. An act granting the consent of Congress to Interstate Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across Mississippi River; and

H. R. 3636. An act to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as reenacted and amended by act of February 23, 1909.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 8493. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to deserving soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war;

H. R. 3042. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto;

H. R. 403. An act granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery;

H. R. 10490. An act to prevent fraudulent advertising in the District of Columbia; and

H. R. 65. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to certain gas, electric light and power, telephone, railroad, and street railway companies and franchises in the Territory of Hawaii, and amending the laws relating thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. WILLIAM G. BROWN, Jr., late a Representative from the State of West Virginia.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

In compliance with the foregoing resolution the President pro tempore of the Senate had appointed as said committee Mr. CHILTON, Mr. GOFF, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. JAMES, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. CLAPP, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Louisiana rise?

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss this pension system.

The SPEAKER. That can be attended to in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. But unless the gentleman speaks on the bill it will not be in order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Louisiana desire to discuss this bill?

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss the entire pension system from stem to stern.

Mr. MANN. That might be in order, but why not ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and give the gentleman the time now?

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I will submit that request. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MORGAN] be given one hour's time for general debate on pension legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and, notwithstanding the general rules, that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MORGAN] shall have one hour for general debate confined to the subject of general pension legislation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for one hour.

OUR PENSION SYSTEM.

Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I am going to undertake the colossal task of attempting to discuss our pension system ab initio through all its vicissitudes down to the present time. At the very forefront of my remarks, I wish to assure you that I fully realize that criticism of this system is not likely to evoke any enthusiastic applause, but on the contrary is calculated to arouse the ire of its custodians, and thereby earn for me an undesirable position in their judgment. Nevertheless this belief, well or ill founded, shall not deter me one jot from my determination to attack freely and unreservedly a system by which the people's finances are disseminated in a spirit of prodigality, unparalleled in the world's annals.

I soon learned, as a Member of Congress, that the word "pension" had a sound to which the politician's politic ear and politic heart are supersensitive. Therefore, out of deference to the sensibilities of these gentlemen, I shall not utter a single word designed to offend them.

Now, I do hope you will believe me when I say that my sense of justice is not distorted in the remotest degree by any feeling of prejudice against the Union soldier.

I am equally interested with you, my colleagues from the North, in doing substantial justice to our illustrious and deserving soldiers. I stand here ready at any time to support, in good will and affection, any measure proposed to care for those who are justly and morally entitled to gratuities, but to compel the great toiling masses of humanity to pay tribute to society drones, idlers, and hangers-on, under the specious plea of patriotism, is more than I am willing to subscribe to.

The Union soldier who faithfully discharged his duty on the field of battle, as he saw and understood that duty, enjoys the respect and affection of the American people on both sides of the Mason and Dixon line.

Years ago, Mr. Speaker, we buried our differences, and those differences are never to be exhumed. Immediately after their burial we cheerfully united with our brother from the North in an effort to reward the deserving soldier of the North. But you who profess to be his untiring champion, the jealous defender of his course, the real appraiser of his services in your mad fight for political preferment, while thinking only of self and working solely for self, you have besmirched the old soldier's good name and minimized his services by placing him in odious company. In this you have been ably and religiously succored by Members from every point of the compass who cherish a similar ambition. The galling thing about these evils is that they are perpetrated in the name of patriotism. Years ago a pension was given as a just and honorable recompense for years of real military service, during which the soldier had either lost his life or suffered in health. But every unprejudiced mind familiar with our pension system knows that a pension is no longer a badge of honor—no longer evidence of a patriotic service rendered—no longer a benefaction given to a worthy soldier in recognition of his patriotism—for we have inscribed on that erstwhile roll of honor the names of soldiers, nondescripts, parasites, drones, and deserters.

Heretofore when the voice of the southern Representative was raised against this ever-expanding system his good faith was immediately assailed and his motives deliberately impugned. The pension contingent would tauntingly point the finger of shame at him and with all their powers of declamation vociferously charge that the southern Representative's environment and training ranged him against any measure or proposition calculated to redound to the benefit of the Union soldier.

You can no longer, at least logically, advance this accusation, for which I trust there never was any real justification. The Union soldiers have about transcended their allotted threescore and ten years and are now rapidly "shuffling off this mortal coil." A few more moons and all these grand old men shall have paid life's penalty. They will be no more. Now, the principal prospective pensioners will be the soldiers of the War with Spain and the Philippine insurrection and their widows. These soldiers came from every section of our Republic, the least of whom the South did not furnish. Therefore you can not with any degree of success argue that I am in anywise actuated in this matter by sectional prejudice. I may be permitted to say that I came to Congress as a southern Representative in sympathy with the pension system, believing that it embraced within its strong arms only those legitimately and truly entitled to ask for and receive pecuniary assistance at the hands of the Government. However, I have been disillusioned. Its patent purposes are commendable and laudable, but its actual achievements, in the main, are absolutely indefensible.

I hope to be able to show in the course of my discussion of this ponderous subject that the American people must either serve notice on the Congress of the United States to immediately revolutionize and vastly improve our whole pension system from stem to stern or have themselves placed in the lamentable position of admitting at the bar of the world their incapacity to freely exercise all the functions of sovereignty.

This country can not sustain this incubus and at the same time offer to uphold our national honor and maintain the inviolability of the Monroe doctrine. If it does, we may become involved in a serious conflict. We are already paying to pensioners on account of the War with Spain $3,851,701 annually, a war wherein we lost, all told, in battles 293 men. In the face of these figures I am reluctant to even speculate on what a real, modern war would cost the American people under our present pension system.

With your indulgence I will try to enumerate the salient features of the most important pension laws enacted since 1793, in order to prove that this system is unquestionably destined to sink this country into the direst economic distress.

On the 25th of February, 1793, after several years of wrangling, the Federal Government adopted its most important act up to that time, under whose provisions the claimant was required to prove decisive disability resulting from known wounds received while in the actual line of duty in the service of the United States during the Revolutionary War, provided that no claim was to be allowed unless presented within two years from its passage. This safety valve, however, was eliminated by a supplementary act of March 3, 1805, under the beneficent provisions of which all persons who, in consequence of known wounds received in the military service of the United States during the Revolutionary War, had at any period since become and continue so disabled as to render them incapable of procuring a livelihood by manual labor, were entitled to a pension.

Congress said, in effect, "Mr. Soldier, apparently you are strong and healthy, but if at any period hereafter you become disabled you are authorized to trace your ailments to wounds received in the line of duty."

On the 10th of April, 1806, Congress passed an act extending the benefits of the pension laws so as to include all volunteers, militia, and State troops who had served in the Revolutionary War, and on the 25th of April, 1808, the Secretary of War was directed to inscribe on the United States pension scrolls the names of all persons appearing on the pension rolls of the various States because of known wounds received by them during the Revolutionary War.

Congress, I dare say, impelled, as usual, by a deep sense of gratitude, on March 18, 1818, again widened the scope of the laws granting pensions. Under this act every person who had served in the Revolutionary War to its close or for a term of nine months or longer, at any period, was pensionable—that is, if his circumstances in life were such as to entitle him to pecuniary aid.

Prior to the passage of this act it was the obvious purpose of the Government to place the soldier whose earning capacity had been impaired by reason of some injury received in the military service of his country on a basis of equality with those who suffered no injury and incurred no incapacity. A sound and commendable principle. But under the generous terms of this act proof of incapacity to earn a livelihood, due to disability incurred in the line of duty, was no longer a prerequisite. The soldier was simply required to show himself to be in impecunious circumstances. Up to the adoption of this measure Congress had studiously endeavored to make it difficult, at least, to loot the Federal Treasury.

The opponents of the act in question were very much perturbed by reason of the liberal terms in which it was couched, and while under consideration its proponents were warned against the adoption of an act the dire effects of which posterity would some day grievously feel. But such remorseless and pessimistic views met with no regard from the majority of their colleagues.

One of its ardent advocates, with that accuracy only equaled by the accuracy of some of our present-day pension prognosticators, estimated that the entire increase of applicants, by reason of the infusion of this new principle into our pension system, would be less than 1,900. In spite of this oracle's prediction there was an unprecedented scrimmage for the Pension Bureau. Something in excess of 30,000 persons immediately endeavored to avail themselves of the provisions of this act instead of 1,900. Under this law the Government the first year paid to pensioners $104,900. In 1819 there was a slight increase.

The Government paid to pensioners in that year under this act $1,833,936.

This reckless distribution of the public funds soon became a subject of newspaper attacks. It was openly and vigorously charged that persons in very comfortable circumstances, in order to bring themselves within its scope, actually proved that they were in dire want.

The criticisms leveled against this act continued to increase in intensity until 1820 when Congress decided to make an effort to safeguard the Government's interests, and at the same time to correct some of the irregularities and frauds which had been discovered. This act required all pensioners under the act of 1818 and all subsequent applicants to submit sworn schedules of their entire estate and income. In addition to this, they were required to swear that they had not disposed of any part of their property in order to come within the purview of the act of 1818. Under this remedial measure the Secretary of War was empowered to strike from the lists those persons who, in his judgment, were able to sustain themselves without the assistance of the Government. Conformably to the authority vested in him, the Secretary of War, after due inquiry and examination, expunged from the pension rolls the names of thousands of fraudulent pensioners.

In the face of these palpable frauds and indefensible impositions on the Government, made possible alone by the loose and extravagant terms of the laws regulating the granting of pensions, Congress deliberately continued to enact legislation calculated to encourage dishonesty and make fraud possible.

After several persistent and ineffectual efforts, Congress on June 7, 1832, enacted a pure-service pension for the benefit of the Revolutionary soldiers. This act granted to all those who had completed a total service of two years during the Revolutionary War, whether in the Continental or State troops, volunteers, militia, or in the Navy, full pay for life according to rank, and a proportionate sum to those who had served not less than six months.

Through the medium of this act, like the act of 1818, the Treasury was verily raided. It resurrected the dead and brought into existence full-fledged pensionable soldiers from every section of the universe. It provided applicants so thick and fast that the people, in spite of their presumed gullibility, could not bring themselves to believe that there were so many living Revolutionary soldiers.

In the Senate its defenders bitterly assailed those who dared to array themselves against the passage of this alleged meritorious measure, and with that enlightened wisdom which has made pension legislators from the early days of our Government ridiculous the Senate and the people were then philosophically informed that the bill would place an additional encumbrance of $450,000 or less on the back of the taxpayers—a mere bagatelle. However, seemingly their estimate was slightly out of joint with the actual amount it finally cost the people. Instead of extracting $450,000 annually from the Treasury, as predicted, it added something in excess of $2,000,000 annually to the pension rolls.

Shocking frauds under this measure were brought to light, culminating in the indictment and prosecution of many persons for forgery and perjury. The Commissioner of Pensions in his annual report of 1834 said, in part:

> Disclosures have been made during the last session showing the necessity of a thorough investigation into the operating of the laws granting pensions and gratuities for military services. As these disclosures have been the result of accident, it is impossible to judge to what extent frauds may have been committed, but enough has occurred to satisfy me that some mode of proceeding is essentially necessary to detect and check these abuses.

You will observe that, in the very teeth of these daring frauds, there has been a continuous and endless widening of the scope of pension legislation.

Up to July 4, 1836, no provisions had been made for the benefit of the Revolutionary widows, so under this act, among other things, it provided that any Revolutionary soldier entitled to a pension under the provisions of the act of June 7, 1832, who had died leaving a widow whose marriage took place before the expiration of his last period of service, she should be entitled to receive the pension her husband might have been allowed had he lived.

On the 14th of July, 1862, Congress passed a law providing pensions for all claims arising out of service in the Civil War. The beneficiaries under this act and the amendatory acts of 1865-66 included all persons who had served in the Army, Regulars, Volunteers, and Militia, and also those who served in the Navy or Marine Corps, including mothers, orphaned sisters, widows, and children under 16 years of age, of any person dying of injury or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty.

Thus we observe Congress, year after year, expanding the beneficent principles of this great system, evidently intending that no person should be permitted to escape the acceptance of a bounty from the Federal Government.

The Commissioner of Pensions, obviously, in the hope of bringing the Congress to a due appreciation of the rights of the people, in his report ending June 30, 1864, said:

> No other nation has provided so liberally for its disabled soldiers and seamen, or for the dependent relatives of the fallen. The Government has undertaken to make up, to a certain specified extent, for the loss of health of members, when incurred strictly in its military or naval service, and to furnish regular pecuniary aid to the families of those whose lives are thus sacrificed. From this simple impulse of justice, manifesting itself in the war of independence, has sprung this entire system, now expanding into proportions perhaps little anticipated in those early days. In place of laws for particular emergencies, cautiously limited to retrospective action, we have now a statute which now puts on an equal footing each arm of the service, embracing the future as well as the present in its scope, and providing for regulars, volunteers, and militia alike.

On February 14, 1871, a straight-out service pension act was passed for the survivors of the War of 1812 who had served 60 days and were honorably discharged. In this act the pauper clause, which was written into the revolutionary act of 1818, was eliminated.

Only a few survivors of the War of 1812 at that time appeared on the rolls and it was then freely said and confidently believed that only a very small number were then living who would be able to avail themselves of the provisions of this act. Yet, before its creators could go home to tell about their patriotic work, the Commissioner of Pensions had received and placed on file 32,000 claims. About the time the people, the burden bearers, had become reconciled to this generous measure, the Congress on March 9, 1878, passed another, under whose broad provisions all soldiers who had served 14 days in the War of 1812 were entitled to a pension and the widows of such persons, irrespective of the date of their marriage. This measure, not unlike its predecessor, immediately brought to the Commissioner of Pensions, 25,000 new claims. These claims were based upon services rendered 63 years prior to the submission of such applications. In 1878, the year of its adoption, we paid to pensioners, under this bill, $1,063,590.52. In 1879, one year after its passage, we paid, in compliance with its liberal provisions, $3,207,225.20.

Congress, in all human likelihood, realizing that the claim agents and pension attorneys were looting the Federal Treasury through the medium of pliable claimants, on the 19th of June, 1878, reduced the fee which claim agents were then entitled to charge for their services in the prosecution of pension claims from $25 to $10, and forbade the filing of contracts in any case by the Commissioner of Pensions and prohibited claim agents and other persons from receiving compensation for services in making application for arrears of pension.

The Commissioner of Pensions in his report of June 30, 1878, referring to the act in question, in part said:

> The act has met the most determined opposition of a class of claim agents who, under the law as it previously stood, enjoyed large facilities for gathering up claims. The agents of this class, in support of this opposition, have not hesitated to circulate through the country the statement that the law was inimical to the interests of the soldiers, both pensioners and claimants, and was intended to be so when passed; alleging that the reduction of the fee and the uncertainty of its collection would deter all reliable and responsible attorneys from aiding the soldier in the prosecution of his claim, and thus he would be prevented from securing his own rights.
> The provisions which were modified by this act were contained in an act passed July 8, 1870, to protect pensioners and claimants from the oppressions and frauds which had theretofore been extensively practiced upon them by unscrupulous claim agents, who succeeded in many cases in securing employment to prosecute pension claims and to collect pension money at the agencies for paying pensions.

Hence we observe that the Commissioner of Pensions, of his own volition, gave to Congress his estimate of pension attorneys and claim agents, and clearly indicated to Congress the tactics to which these men resort in their efforts to flimflam the Government; but was it productive of the adoption of any remedial legislation? On the contrary. On January 25, 1879, Congress passed what is known as the "arrears act." Under the provisions of this monstrosity, claims were allowed with arrears dating back to the Civil War. In this, Congress held out an irresistible incentive to claim agents and other interested persons to present new claims. This was, of course, a veritable El Dorado for claim agents, who were entitled to receive under its provisions $10 for each new claim. Whilst they were not to receive any compensation for making application for arrears as a matter of right, however, we can safely assume that they were the recipients of a little evasive money whenever they wrested from the Federal Government a claim carrying with it a premium well advanced in the hundreds.

How the Congress can justify the adoption of this legislative prodigy I am wholly incapable of even conjecturing.

However, the Senate soon realized that the costs of this act would soon bankrupt the country; consequently, on March 3, 1879, Congress passed an amendatory act which, in substance, provided that no pension should be allowed to cover any period prior to the date of the claimant's actual disability, and that arrears should be granted only in those cases where application had been filed with the Commissioner of Pensions prior to July 1, 1880. According to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions our total disbursements of pensions during the year ending 1878 were $26,844,000. Our total expenditures for 1880 by reason of this act amounted to $57,240,000.

The Commissioner of Pensions, feeling outraged by the extraordinary facilities afforded by the existing system for the successful prosecution of fraudulent and unmeritorious claims, in his report for 1879 said, in part:

As the law stood previous to the passage of the arrears act, temptation to fraud was very great, but since that act it is many times increased. Then the claims were comparatively few in which any considerable sum of money would be the immediate reward of a successfully prosecuted claim, but since that act every invalid claim allowed, as well as many of the other classes, will have in it from several hundred to several thousand dollars due the claimant at the first payment. It is admitted by those best informed that there have been not less than $2,000,000 paid out annually for fraudulent pensions. In my judgment the estimate is below rather than above the actual amount. With the temptation to the commission of fraud so greatly increased and the road to the Treasury so easy, the consequences can easily be foretold. Not only will the people be taxed to pay an annual tribute to the unworthy man, but with so many claims pending and still to be presented it will be little less than a miracle if extensive official corruption does not follow.

Mr. Speaker, did the arrears act satisfy the claim agents and other beneficiaries? Yes; so long as ready and willing claimants could be gathered in bunches; but after wresting hundreds of millions of dollars from the Federal Treasury by means of this act, or rather accomplice in sin, claimants became few and far between. Hence it was necessary to write a new principle into the system in order to create another strong and vigorous group of claimants. Therefore Congress, on the 27th of June, 1890, adopted an act which provided—

That all persons who served 90 days or more in the military service of the United States during the Civil War and who now or may hereafter be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of his own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from the performance of manual labor in such a degree as to render them unable to earn a support, shall be placed upon the list of invalid pensioners.

Furthermore, the widow of such a soldier under this act is entitled to receive a pension without proving the soldier's death to be the result of his military service.

The soldier is merely required to show 90 days' service in the Army or Navy and produce a medical certificate certifying that he has a mental or physical disability that disqualifies him, in whole or in part, from earning his support by manual labor, provided, however, that it is not the result of the claimant's own vicious habits, which simply means that every conceivable disability from which mortal man may suffer is pensionable.

Where is the man who, under our ex parte system of evidence, can not bring his disability within the meaning of this act? There is no distinction between the rich and the poor, no distinction between those ills superinduced by the service and those the inevitable result of carelessness and self-neglect.

In 1891, the first year after the adoption of this measure, the Government granted, in obedience to its provisions, 102,387 original claims, and in 1892, 197,870, costing the taxpayers the first year $8,907,636, and the second year $51,407,971.

Seemingly there is an unwritten law that we shall not endure our pension rolls to shrink or dwindle. Whenever such a tendency evidences itself Congress forthwith broadens the laws granting pensions. In 1912 our pension disbursements dropped several million dollars. Immediately thereafter a pure service pension law was enacted for the Union soldiers and those who fought in the Mexican War. This act had the usual desired effect. Our pension rolls aggregated in 1912, $157,323,103. The following year we disbursed on account of pensions $174,160,717.

It is the basic duty of pension statesmen to keep the pension roll in a strong and vigorous condition. The exigency of contriving new schemes and writing them into our pension system doubtless entails a great deal of labor. Yet, be it said, to their eternal credit, that they have never been found deficient.

On February 16, 1916, we passed an act which seeks to establish in the War Department and the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as "The Army and Navy medal of honor roll."

The beneficiaries of this act are persons who have attained or shall attain the age of 65 years, and who have been awarded a medal of honor for having distinguished themselves conspicuously by gallantry or intrepidity.

Under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are required to construe the evidence in favor of each applicant liberally and favorably, and in cases of doubt, the applicant shall be given the benefit of the doubt, and each person whose name shall have been entered on this roll under the provisions of this act shall receive a special pension of $10 per month for life.

On the 16th of February, 1916, we had the privilege of adopting another most admirable measure; that is, if its worth is to be measured by its prospective tax-absorbing capacity.

If an officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States, either as a Regular or Volunteer, during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection or in China, between April 21, 1898, and July 24, 1903, inclusive, has died, leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per annum, such widow shall, upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the regular pension rolls at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child under the age of 16 years.

Our modern Congressmen have a veritable genius for widening the scope of our pension legislation. In comparison, their predecessors were bungling amateurs. Here is an act that does not pension those alone who actually engaged in any battle nor those alone who were exposed to the dangers of war. Why, it does not even require any military service of the most superficial nature.

Service under this act is to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, including furloughs. In other words, upon the mere fact of enlistment the Bureau of Pensions is directed to irretrievably sentence the Government to grant pensions to the widows of all officers and enlisted men, not even requiring the widow to show her husband's death to be the result of his Army or Navy service.

You unpardonably presume upon your authority when you undertake to pension widows who have not the slightest semblance of a right to such gratuities. To pension widows whose husbands, if living, could not legitimately secure a bounty is not only untenable but, moreover, repugnant to my sense of justice.

Under this act a widow without means of support other than her own daily labor and an actual net income of $250 a year is entitled to a pension. She may possess in her own rights property worth thousands of dollars, yet under this act she would be pensionable unless her net income was over and above $250, exclusive of her own earnings. This is a travesty on justice.

Think of the thousands of downtrodden and toiling widows throughout this broad land upon whose frail and weary shoulders in part falls the burden of carrying our favorite beneficiaries and political underlings. No pulse of pity beats in your bosom for these widows. Of course, they do not know that this great system makes it infinitely more arduous for them to keep the wolf from their hovels. But the fathers, brothers, uncles, and other male relatives of the pensionable class of widows know how assiduously we labor to liberalize this system, and here lies the mischief.

It is inconceivable to me, Mr. Speaker, how we can return to our respective districts and look our constituents in the face without the flush of shame coursing to our hypocritical physiognomies. We are deliberately trifling with the rights of the American people. We preach economy; we excoriate extravagance; we denounce pork barrels; we protest against this expenditure and that expenditure; but these outbursts of oratory are simply for the delectation of the boys back home. While we are espousing economy we are devising schemes to unbolt the doors of the Treasury in order that it may be more accessible to those who have designs thereon. These innumerable acts passed this session alone shall add thousands and thousands of dollars to our annual pay roll, and in all human likelihood long after we return to our respective districts, there to permanently remain, our constituents will be called upon to meet these charges that we here so complacently create.

Now, again, a few days ago we passed an act whereby we propose to pension all persons who fought against Indian depredations, or, rather, those who can show by oral evidence that they were on the warpath with the Indians for at least three months or during the life of any given campaign.

If such an act as this does not stimulate fraud, fraud is a myth. Every human being who ever gazed upon or encountered a redskin on the warpath in those days will experience little difficulty in showing a service of three months, and thereby establish a pensionable status.

Under the provisions of this act we stipulate to grant pensions to the surviving officers and enlisted men and their widows of the Texas volunteers who served 90 days in the defense of the frontier of that State against Indian depredations and to the surviving officers and enlisted men, including the militia and volunteers of the military service of the United States who have reached the age of 62 years and who have served for 90 days in the campaign in southern Oregon and Idaho and in the northern parts of California and Nevada; the campaign against Sioux in Minnesota and the Dakotas; the campaigns against the Sioux in Wyoming; the campaign against the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, and Comanches in Kansas, Colorado, and Indian Territory; the Modoc War; the campaign against the Apaches in Arizona; the campaign against the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes in Kansas, Colorado, Texas, Indian Territory, and New Mexico; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes and the Sioux in 1876–77; the Nez Perce War; the Bannock War; the campaign against the Northern Cheyennes in 1878–79; the Black Hawk Indian War in Utah; the campaign against the Ute Indians in Colorado and Utah; the campaign against the Apache Indians in Arizona; the campaign against the Sioux Indians in South Dakota.

We have pensioned every person who has been in anywise suspected of having the slightest connection with any of the wars in which this Government participated. Now, it is our determination to pension all those who can show by oral evidence that they participated in any of the campaigns against the Indians.

Of course the life of some of these campaigns did not last much longer than a modern prize fight, so we very adroitly overcome this obstacle by pensioning not those alone who served 90 days but those also who served during the entire period of any one campaign, irrespective of its duration. There can be no doubt but that the devil knew not what he did when he made man politic.

Heretofore, we have religiously insisted that the applicants should be required to show a specified length of service in the military service of the United States, but under the lax verbiage of this measure specified length of service and enlistment in the military service of the United States are both dispensed with.

Yet it has been a fundamental principle of our pension laws that only enlisted men in the United States Army should be pensioned, but this shattering of a basic principle gives us no concern, especially since it is in the interest of a great system.

I have striven to show in a concise manner how the pension legislation, under the tender ministrations of pension legislators, has budded and blossomed into a collossal system. The man who makes a determined effort to reach the Federal pay roll and fails through our broad and undeniably lax pension system must, indeed, be a sorry specimen of a soldier.

We began by requiring the soldier to prove decisive disability resulting from known wounds received while in the actual line of duty in the service of the United States. The soldier was given at first six months, and then, subsequently, two years to discover his wounds. Several years thereafter the limit was expunged in toto. Next, the United States assumed the payment of all Revolutionary invalid pensioners in the several States. Later, we broadened our laws by granting a pension predicated upon nine months' service and impecunious circumstances. We again extended the benefits of the pension laws so as to embrace the widow of the deceased soldier, requiring her, however, to show the soldier's death to be the result of his Army or Navy service. A few years come and go and we grant a pension to those suffering from some physical disability, not the result of their own vicious habits, upon proving 90 days' service. We again broaden the scope of our pension laws by granting pension to the widow without imposing upon her the necessity of proving the soldier's death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, and then we passed pure pension laws on account of the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, and the War with Mexico, and the Civil War.

This session we have extended the scope of our pension laws in order to embrace and include all those who participated in the Indian wars, Indian disturbances, and Indian campaigns.

I have done my utmost to give you a summary of the most important laws the Congress has enacted from 1793 down to the present day. From a laudable and commendable act adopted in 1793 has sprung this system that induces rascality, places a premium on perjury, encourages idleness, stimulates fraud, demoralizes our soldiery, makes sycophants of our public men, holds patriotism up to contempt, exposes the worthy soldier to ridicule, and misappropriates the people's money. I am wholly at a loss to conjecture how any man, in possession of all his faculties and believing in even-handed justice and an impartial administration of the affairs of his country, can bring himself to countenance this system.

Under our magnanimous and unequaled pension laws we provide for the indigent and affluent, the well and the sick, the decrepit and the robust, the deserving and the undeserving.

The people's faith in the justice of our pension legislation has made them an unconscious instrument in the furtherance of a system that has become dangerous to their welfare. They are a noble and generous people, and are worthy of the best a man has in him, yet every scheme that can be devised whereby a portion of the country can live in idleness at the expense of the majority has been insidiously read into our pension system. "There is, however, a limit at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue."

Do you realize that we have paid to pensioners from 1866 to 1915 the appalling and gigantic sum of $4,799,030,192? In addition to this, our disbursements on account of salaries in the bureau, salaries of special examiners and examining surgeons, salaries of pension agents, clerk hire, and so forth, have reached the startling sum of $120,718,334. We are not unlike the cowardly assassin who, under the cover of darkness, plunges his deadly weapon into the back of his unsuspecting fellowman and dashes away, leaving the death-dealing instrument quivering in the flesh of his victim. We stand here and supinely impose these deleterious burdens upon the toiling masses, and thus clandestinely betray the trust that the people whom we profess to love and revere repose in us. Then we depart in triumph, leaving the horny-handed sons of toil to pay the wages of our sins. Invariably, when there is an effort made to expose this species of kleptomania, the pension advocates, in order to justify their generosity, rise on the floor of the House and, with lips twitching with feigned emotions, denounce the cold-blooded and remorseless Member who dares to array himself against the system, and for the millionth time will recount the heroic and valorous deeds of the old veterans, which also includes those who never saw a battle field, unless it was on a moving-picture screen since the beginning of the European war. This is a sort of sedative with which they expect to humanize the victims of their prodigality. In the year 1866, after the worst conflict we have ever engaged in, we paid to pensioners for the year ending June 30, 1866, $15,450,540; 50 years subsequent to that unfortunate occurrence our disbursements of pensions reached the munificent sum of $165,518,266, in spite of the fact that we are losing approximately 35,000 Civil War soldiers every year.

Do you get the full import of this incubus? Where is the man who can hear these appalling figures and feel no self-reproach? I will hazard the guess in passing that he is not a Member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, to have an actual pension pay roll of $165,000,000, 50 years after the Civil War and 17 years after the Spanish-American skirmish, shows indisputably that there is something wrong in the State of Denmark. Out of this sum we send annually $35,000 to pensioners in our insular possessions and $945,000 to foreign countries.

These old soldiers are rapidly passing out into the great beyond. As I said, an average of 35,000 each year literally retire from the scene of human action. Hence, in a few brief years the last of their names will disappear from the pension rolls, but the American people need not wheedle themselves into believing that by reason of the death of the old veteran the rolls will dwindle and become less onerous. It is like Banquo's ghost. It will not down. The pension advocate feels that he has a jiujitsu hold on the United States Treasury, and you can rest assured that he does not contemplate relinquishing any advantage he now enjoys, even though his refusal to do so depletes the exchequer, about which he is not particularly concerned. He occupies a strategic position, and he knows it. At the threshold of the Treasury the stalwart Spanish-American soldier stands, as a matter of right, waiting to supersede the Union veterans. He is where the Representatives of the people placed him. These countless soldiers, many of whom have and many more desire to prove that they providentially escaped the enfilading fire of the enemy only to find themselves battle worn, prematurely old, and broken in health by reason of that protracted and ultrahazardous struggle.

I am going to try to demonstrate to those of you who are open to conviction that the pension roll is here to stay. We paid our Revolutionary soldiers from 1776 to 1906, when the last pensioner on account of that war died, $70,000,000. We paid from 1812 to 1915, on account of the War of 1812, $45,972,895. Again, we paid to pensioners from 1846 to 1915, on account of the Mexican War, $49,618,948. We paid on account of the Spanish-American War, from 1898 to 1915, $49,944,441. In other words, we paid to the Revolutionary soldiers and their widows, covering a period of 130 years, only a few more dollars than the Spanish-American War has already cost this country. We have paid to soldiers of the War of 1812 and their widows, covering a period of 104 years, $3,971,546 less than we have already paid on account of the Spanish-American War. We have paid to the soldiers of the War with Mexico and their widows, covering a period of 69 years, $325,493 less than the Spanish-American War has already extracted from the Treasury.

In our War with Spain we lost in battles 17 men in the Philippines, 3 men in Porto Rico, and 273 men in Cuba. Approximately only 38,000 men participated in the military operations of that war, nevertheless, there are now over 29,000 of these soldiers drawing pensions. Our pension disbursements last year on account of this war aggregated $3,851,701. The meteoric rise of pensions on account of this tempest in a teapot is not calculated to disturb the equanimity of pension statesmen, who sit here and vote away the money of their constituents, but it may give the thoughtful men of this country something to ponder on.

Three million eight hundred and fifty-one thousand seven hundred and one dollars is a mere bagatelle in the estimate of these philanthropists. Wait; give them time to widen the scope of the laws for the benefit of the Spanish-American soldiers, and they will make the Civil War pension rolls appear infantile. After reading these pension figures I am reminded of Crabbe's philosophical description of the fidelity of a well-known dumb beast:

With eye upraised, his master's looks to scan,
The joy, the solace, and the aid of man;
The rich man's guardian, the poor man's friend;
The only creature faithful to the end.

We not only empower but, moreover, hold out a strong incentive to pension attorneys and claim agents to go upon the highways and byways with a dragnet to pluck all pension claimants. Men, ostensibly enjoying good health, under the tutelage of these agents, soon discover in themselves ills which, in all probability, would never have been discovered or conceived but for these benefactors. Under the careful guidance of a claim agent and a solicitous physician who ordinarily is an adept in tracing ailments back to the military service, these applicants invariably discover that their ills are pensionable. Even though they had not suffered enough to induce them to apply for a pension until years after the war, and then only at the instance of a pension attorney or a claim agent. Congress from time to time has been supposedly importuned by a patriotic people to widen the pension laws, but in reality these appeals, in practically every instance, have been results of cleverly conducted campaigns vitalized by claim agents, pension attorneys, and other interested persons. While politicians are generally good judges of men, yet it is a regrettable fact that Congress has often been the dupe of ingenious and mercenary attorneys, agents, and prospective beneficiaries.

I have made a cursory examination of the records for the past 10 years in order to ascertain if these claim agents are interested in liberalizing our pension laws and, if so, to what extent.

Now, I find that we paid to pension attorneys on account of pensions, in 1901, $591,245; 1902, $582,581; 1903, $557,657; 1904, $692,295; 1905, $719,365; 1907, $412,105; 1908, $264,522; 1909, $331,237; 1911, $163,610.06; 1912, $138,837.72. I have been unable to secure the figures for the years 1906, 1910, 1913, and 1914.

Now, let us delve into the affairs of the Bureau of Pensions for the last 10 years in order to know if there are any other persons interested in the expansion of this system.

I find that the salaries in the bureau; salaries of special examiners, per diem, and expenses; fees for examining surgeons; salaries of pension agents and clerk hire aggregated—

1905	$3,721,832.82
1906	3,523,269.51
1907	3,309,110.44
1908	2,800,963.36
1909	2,852,583.73
1910	2,657,673.86
1911	2,517,127.06

No injustice is so repellant to the rank and file of our people as the betrayal of a public trust. We deliberately presume upon our authority when we lavishly vote pensions for the support and maintenance of a favorite class to the injury and hurt of the toiling masses of the human race.

In the words of Rumbold:

I never could believe that Providence had sent a few men into the world ready spurred and booted to ride and millions ready saddled and bridled to be ridden.

The Commissioner of Pensions in his report of 1871 in part said:

The records of national cemeteries have been brought into use for the purpose of determining the names and services of those buried there. Women were then hunted up who were induced to execute applications for pensions on account of the service and death of these soldiers. These women became pliant tools in the hands of the operators. A prima facie case is made out by means of "stock witnesses" and the originators of the fraud pocket the money of the first payment, leaving the fraudulent claimant to reap the benefit of the future payments.

Great difficulty is often experienced by this bureau in proving a marriage or marriage relations alleged to have occurred 30 or 40 years ago.

The Commissioner of Pensions, in his report of 1878, said in part:

A comparatively smaller number of professional claim agents and claim firms in Washington and some other points in the country, through the intervention of subagents and by extensive advertising, employed for the purpose in some instances sheets issued in the form of periodical newspapers purporting to be published in the interest of the soldiers, the columns of which contained matter in which apparent anxiety for the soldier's welfare and appeals to their love of gain were cunningly intermingled, always representing the advertisers as in the enjoyment of special and peculiar facilities for the successful prosecution of claims, and usually adding the suggestion that no charge would be made unless the pension should be obtained.

In his report of 1878, in part, he said:

Without reflecting upon the intelligence and integrity of these surgeons in general, it is a fact that the reports of these examinations too often bear evidence that they were of the most superficial character, and not infrequently are they found to be untruthful in whole or in part.

Mr. Speaker, now we come to the private pension system, the most inexcusable custom that the Congress has ever countenanced. We are all more or less politically ambitious. We either hope to remain in Congress or to be committed to service of wider scope, a very laudable ambition indeed. So we gladly avail ourselves of any scheme or policy by which an unsuspecting constituency may be made to aid and assist us in the retention of that which we now enjoy, or in the attainment of something higher up. Frankly, this is the raison d'être of the practice. What millions we squander that Cæsar might be great!

Now, if after an examination the bureau finds that the applicant's military record shows that from fear or some other reason equally as unworthy, the applicant refused to share the dangers which confronted his comrades and absconded, his application is forthwith rejected. The bureau is governed neither by politics nor by sentiment. It has its limitations, and they are not transgressed or abused, but the Congressman's authority pertaining to pensions and soldiers is omnipotent. His jurisdiction is as boundless as the globe. His efforts are circumscribed by no law, no rule, no precedent—nothing but his political conscience. So the rejected applicant goes from the bureau to his Representative who introduces a bill and, you can depend upon it, if the Congressman possesses the requisite log-rolling proclivities, Congress will in due course of business transform this Marathon racer into a hero. At the same time he will be provided with a liberal pension for the balance of his natural life as a balm to his outraged sensibilities. We may continue by congressional action to ingraft on the pension rolls the names of deserters, perjurers, and fakers; but there are some things even beyond the power of a Congressman. By laying so many stripes on a donkey's back you can not turn him into a zebra, and neither can you by legislative action convert the deserter into an honorable and worthy soldier. Your rhetoric can not add to the honor or glory of him who has acted well his part, but a grievous wrong you do him when you undertake to place on a parity with him deserters and fakers whose right to pecuniary assistance from the Government is absolutely nonexistent. I venture the assertion that there is not a single solitary meritorious claim that does not come within the purview of our grotesquely extravagant legislation. Every ailment, every conceivable disability, and every fancied incapacity have been anticipated and provided for.

Hence, the Congress can not justify before the American people this indiscriminate passage of private pension acts. This method of imposing additional burdens upon the taxpayers calls for condign punishment at the hands of those who must pay the toll. This system is contrary to every principle of fair dealing and good policy.

Now, if the advocate of this method of granting pensions asserts that there are meritorious claims that do not come within the provisions of the general laws, then it is up to the Congress to authorize the Commissioner of Pensions to report such claims to Congress and prohibit the passage of every private bill that does not bear the recommendation and indorsement of the Commissioner of Pensions. A private act will then have no political significance and hence of no political importance to any Member. If you do this, I will hazard the guess in passing that our private pension act system will anon fall into "innocuous desuetude."

For your edification I beg leave to say that the number of pensions granted by special acts during the Fifty-fourth Congress were 378; Fifty-fifth, 694; Fifty-sixth, 1,391; Fifty-seventh, 2,171; Fifty-eighth, 3,355; Fifty-ninth, 6,080; Sixtieth, 6,600; Sixty-first, 9,649; Sixty-second, 6,350; and Sixty-third, 5,061.

From 1871 to 1915 we granted, by special acts, 47,398 pensions. These acts alone cost the American people millions of dollars, about the merits of which it is indeed charitable to say there are grave doubts.

During the Sixty-fourth Congress we passed 5,061. The annual value of these acts is $1,257,000 and they add to the pension roll $552,507 annually.

This session already we have passed a raft of private acts and, furthermore, have introduced into this great system new and more generous principles, which will also ultimately add a few million dollars annually to the rolls. This record may fill us with pride, but it is not a shining sunset in the eyes of the American people.

Europe has a very conservative pension system, which is judiciously executed. A European soldier is entitled to a pension only after long years of service or upon due proof of a physical disability actually incurred in the military service.

The maximum service pension a German soldier receives, and receives only after 36 years, is $7.30 per month.

The maximum service pension a British soldier receives, and only after 21 years, is $7.80.

Our Civil War veteran who served from 90 days to 3 years, at any period during the Civil War, is entitled to a pension ranging from $13 to $30 per month, predicated upon his age.

The highest disability pension to which our soldier is entitled is $30. The highest disability to which the English private is entitled is $18 per month. The British disability pension, moreover, remains in force only so long as the soldier's disability exists, and to this end he must submit to an annual medical examination. Our soldier, on the other hand, may be temporarily impaired, but when he once succeeds in writing his name on the pension roll, it is likely to remain there for life and a day.

Mr. Speaker, it is one of the melancholy ironies of life that our precedents should return to plague us. We have been engaged, lo, these many years in constructing this pension system without the consent or the approval of the people. It is now assuming disquieting and threatening proportions. So potential, so powerful, so gigantic has become this system of laws that Congress to-day stands in awe of it. The Congressmen, with a few exceptions, are afraid to antagonize the political friends and beneficiaries of this system, which they well know is economically enslaving the American people.

Of course, it is politically expedient to follow the line of least resistance. Every mother's son knows that. So in one voice we proclaim, "On with the dance, let joy be unconfined," and thus we pusillanimously subscribe to the system.

Arguing to ourselves that the old nincompoops at home do not fully appreciate that these pension burdens are their burdens, and should the truth finally percolate through their craniums we shall go home and make a Fourth of July speech in which we will extol in martyred tones the grandeur and nobility of the character of the old soldier and end in drawing a pathetic picture of him, after years of service, advancing with head bowed down and unsteady step toward that sepulcher where all of his earthly tribulations shall come to a close, and thus we sophistically appeal to the patriotism of the people.

If our legislative acts embraced only such worthy and deserving beneficiaries it would not lie well in the mouth of anyone to criticize our pension legislation, but, unhappily, such is not the fact.

We can not go on here ad infinitum creating debts for our constituents to liquidate. There will come a day of reckoning, and when it does come we shall be unceremoniously swept from the throne of authority. Such will be the vengeance that shall fall on those of us who forget that the political power in this free land resides in the people.

I am heartily in favor of a service-pension law which will provide for all soldiers who, after years of honorable and conscientious service, find themselves in the evening of life in reduced circumstances.

I especially believe in providing for those who have become incapacitated wholly or in part by reason of some injury received or disease contracted in the military service of the United States.

I sincerely believe that the widow and orphans, or in their absence the dependent mother and the dependent father of any person dying of injury received or disease incurred in the line of duty in the service of the United States, should receive a pension, requiring, however, the widow to show that her marriage to the soldier occurred prior to or during the soldier's service. In my opinion to grant a pension under any other pretext or upon any other ground is violative of the rights of the American people.

Why are the rights of the toiling and producing masses of mankind less worthy of your protection than this favorite class you have taken unto your fond embrace? We can only justify this manifest favoritism by resorting to some specious argument which is tantamount to adding insult to injury.

I can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, all the beautiful things and all the worthy things that grow under the blue sky. I verily believe that I am liberal enough to render unto Cæsar things that are Cæsar's. I think I have enough patriotism in my make-up to enable me to appreciate to the fullest extent the intrinsic worth of our splendid and valorous soldiery, but I can not join you in your effort to maintain a system which shall inevitably end in the deterioration of our soldiery. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 10 minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DIXON). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, which I shall not do, I desire to say that I have not interrupted the gentleman from Louisiana, who has just spoken, although I thoroughly disagree with much that he has said. I give notice that I shall, upon the next private-pension day, ask some time of the House in order to answer the gentleman from Louisiana and some of his observations.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Texas upon what subject he wants to speak.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I desire to submit a few remarks on behalf of my constituents who live along the Mexican border.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to a matter in regard to which Congress as well as the President may have a duty to perform. I refer to the continued disorder in Mexico. If that disorder did not menace the peace and security of our own people, if it did not violate our own sovereignty, and if it did not extend itself across our own border and result in the assassination and outrage of our own people, we might, with some degree of patience, continue to content ourselves with the policy of watchful waiting. However, the chaos and disorder reigning within the borders of Mexico, the failure of her people for so long a time to restore peace and government, and the absence of any reasonable prospect of establishing an effective government there, either in the immediate or the distant future, give ample grounds for a reexamination of our position.

Mr. Speaker, revolution after revolution for many years have followed each other in rapid succession in that unhappy country, during which cruelties, barbarities, outrages, and murders against their own people as well as Americans and other foreigners have been and continue to be so numerous, flagrant, and inhuman as to shock the sensibilities and human sympathies of the civilized world. The country has been devastated and its inhabitants impoverished and famished. Millions in American property has been destroyed, and American trade and commerce have suffered enormous losses; our citizens and soldiers have been shot from across the boundary line of the two countries; our territory has often been invaded by lawless bandits and our citizens terrorized and murdered and their property stolen; our neutrality laws have been violated and we have been and continue to be put to great effort and expense in protecting our border. All these things have constantly caused the greatest irritation, uneasiness, annoyance, and disturbance among our own citizens.

Primarily, of course, the duty of restoring peace and order in Mexico rests upon the people of Mexico themselves, and we have constantly recognized this fact. We have not only exercised great patience and forbearance toward them in the face of the greatest provocation to have acted otherwise, but we have stood ready at all times to render the most friendly assistance to them. In pursuance of this altruistic policy we recognized the de facto government of Carranza, in the hope that our recognition, together with the recognition given him by other American and European Governments, would give him such advantages as would enable him to establish an efficient government and restore peace and order. But what has followed? A condition apparently as bad and perhaps in some respects even worse than before. In territory which Carranza claimed to control 18 American citizens were atrociously murdered. They were invited by Carranza authorities into Mexico, where they had property or employment. They went there with Carranza passports in their pockets, and, I am informed, with the strongest assurances of protection. On their way the train upon which they were traveling was stopped and because they were American citizens they were cruelly murdered and mutilated by Mexicans, and notwithstanding they were unarmed and helpless they were not given the slightest chance for their lives.

Our Government, as it should have done, called upon Carranza to capture and punish the murderers of these unoffending, unarmed, and helpless Americans, but up to this good hour it seems that nothing has been done by him except to give his promise. It is patent to everyone that the Carranza Government is either unwilling or unable to make his promise good or to afford protection to Americans or others.

The report is that Carranza is without a fixed capital, without money or credit, without governmental machinery, and that he is moving about from place to place as far away from the danger zone as possible, while bandits and outlaws are roaming about at will looting and murdering.

Mr. Speaker, the climax of this terrible and deplorable situation was reached when an organized band of Mexican outlaws and murderers under the command of that treacherous, bloodthirsty, archvillain, Villa, under the cover of night stealthily crossed the international border, crept into the American town of Columbus, set it on fire, and began the bloody work of murdering its inhabitants. When this massacre started the people were still asleep, having retired with the feeling that they had all the security this great Government of ours could give. A number of civilians, including one woman and a number of United States soldiers, were killed and the town burned. And doubtless not a person in the town would have been left alive had it not been for the timely interference of our troops.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask what our Government should do with reference to this appalling crime? Shall we let it go unavenged? Shall we depend upon the Carranza Government, weak and inefficient as it has proven itself to be, to capture and punish these offenders? No. I dare say no one can be found who would for a moment believe the Carranza Government could or would do so. It is absolutely idle to think of such a thing. Shall we content ourselves with only a warning to Carranza? As one of the Representatives in this House of the American people who live along the Mexican border, I want to make it clear that such a course would not satisfy them. They demand that such action be taken by this Government as will henceforth afford them adequate security and protection, and I believe they are entitled to make this demand. [Applause.]

If we let this awful crime go unpunished, there will in future be no safety for Americans living along the border of Mexico. Their feeling of security will be absolutely gone, and Mexican murderers will be encouraged to repeat the Columbus massacre when and where they please.

Mr. Speaker, I know not what the views of the other Members of this House may be regarding this matter, but I want to say that I myself have come to a very definite conclusion. This Government should take the matter into its own hands. An adequate military force of our own should at once be ordered to take the trail of this band of night assassins and pursue them until they are captured, dead or alive. [Applause.] If captured alive, they should be brought back to Columbus, where they are guilty of murder, and hanged. And I would put no 2-mile nor 15-mile limit on our troops. I would say, "Go to the uttermost parts of Mexican territory if necessary." And I would say to Carranza, "We are only performing a duty in the name of justice and humanity which you should, but can not, perform. We are determined that those who have violated our laws shall pay the penalty."

If the President is without the authority to send troops into Mexico for such a purpose, then I am in favor of conferring the authority upon him.

It is said that these murderous attacks upon Americans are made by Villa with the deliberate purpose of forcing American intervention in Mexico. If this be true, I, for one, am in favor of accommodating ourselves to his purpose; but when we go into Mexico let our first and chief aim and purpose be to get his own head.

Mr. Speaker, I am offering no criticism of our administration. The President has no doubt pursued the policy which he was convinced was best for all concerned, which he thought would keep us out of war with Mexico and result in the reestablishing of stable and efficient government in that country. None of us has wanted war, and we do not want war now. And the course I have suggested should not mean war. The sending of troops into Mexican territory to capture and bring back those who have committed such a diabolical crime against our people and against our laws should not provoke a war with Mexico, but if it should, if the Mexican people shall force a war upon us because we seek for ourselves the justice and protection which it is their duty to give us, but which they do not give us, then I say let it come. If peace is to be purchased at the cost of other Columbus massacres, then the people I represent are not for peace. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may have his time extended three minutes in order that I may ask him some questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This relates to an area with which the gentleman is personally acquainted, it being practically his home.. Has he any special information as to the number of troops that accompanied Villa on this raid?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I have none except what the papers have stated.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it the gentleman's information that Villa was accompanied upon this raid, either to the border or beyond the border, by from one to three thousand men?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that I have no information whatever upon that subject except what I have seen in the papers. I have consulted no one.

Mr. SHERWOOD. There were six companies of Cavalry—about 600 men—at Columbus, N. Mex.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. But the gentleman from Minnesota was inquiring about the forces of Villa.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And assuming that Villa forces numbered from one to three thousand, could they be viewed by us as simply a marauding band of irresponsible cutthroats?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Does the indignity not assume the proportions of almost a national incursion?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would treat them as outlaws and cutthroats and murderers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They are cutthroats, surely, and ought to be shot as such.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the nature of the offense depend at all on whether there were 300 or 3,000 of these marauding, savage Indians under the chieftainship, presumably, of the greatest murderer known to the whole century? Is it not equal in indignity to the United States whether there were 300 or 3,000?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with both gentlemen, precisely, but my inquiry reached to another point. Can we view this band coming from Mexico in this way as being the act of a small group of irresponsible outlaws and outcasts or is it an expedition that is backed up by a very large proportion of the sentiment of the people from which it comes? That was my inquiry.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] in a roundabout way for some information, if the gentleman from Texas will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Has the gentleman from Minnesota any information on which to base his suggestion that Villa's forces numbered from 1,000 to 3,000?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have read the press dispatches to that effect.

Mr. KEATING. That is all the information the gentleman has?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was all, and that was the reason I made the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I yield.

Mr. TAGGART. Is not the very irresponsibility, if it is irresponsibility, of the Government of Mexico the strongest argument in favor of protecting American citizens against that same incapacity to maintain a civilized government there?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I agree with the gentleman fully.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I could not, if I had two hours instead of two minutes, express my indignation and horror at this great international crime, but supplementing the little effort I made to reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], I desire to say further that none of us has definite information, and the conditions are such that it is impossible to get definite information as to the number of bandits that were in this band of murderers that came to Columbus, N. Mex., and did so much murderous work in so short a time. Conditions in Mexico are very peculiar. Loyalty fluctuates. It goes from one side to the other, and whether they be Carranza thieves and murderers or Villa thieves and murderers makes no difference. Most of those people down there dislike the people of the United States, and the dislike of these ignorant Indians, who are encouraged to cultivate their prejudice, is such that while they may cheerfully cut each others' throats on occasions they will stop that work, however much it is gratifying to their taste, to indulge in the more delectable pastime of cutting American throats, and it does not make a particle of difference whose uniform they wear.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How long does the gentleman think we ought to offer ourselves up to their holiday?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think we have already granted a needless extension of time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one more minute. [Cries of "Take five minutes!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to address the House out of order for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to serve notice that after two more speeches upon this subject I expect to object to any further remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I wish that some one to whose words the President of the United States will give heed will suggest to him the following course. Address a communication to President Carranza, of Mexico, to this effect:

"Although recognized as the Chief Executive of the Republic of Mexico it is obvious that you are impotent, not only to protect the rights of Americans in your own country but to restrain certain of your nationals from invading American soil. I therefore propose to send into your country a punitive expedition to destroy the Villistas and if possible to capture Villa and hang him to the nearest tree. I sincerely trust that the people of Mexico and its Government will not, in view of the unusual circumstances, consider this an unfriendly act on the part of the United States, but whether they do or not I propose to follow this course."

I also wish that the person to whose words the President will give heed will further suggest to him that for once in the course of his administration he will follow his words with action and make good.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Mexico asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I desire to say that I voice the sentiment of the people of New Mexico upon the recent raid and outrage committed by a marauding band of Mexicans from Mexico in our State when I say that it has about reached the time in the course of those outrages where patience ceases to be a virtue. The people of New Mexico have not communicated to me from any part any of the details of this recent horror, but concerning the massacre committed at Santa Isabel, in the State of Chihuahua, several weeks ago, I received a telegram and a set of resolutions some time after that outrage was committed, voicing exactly the sentiments that have been expressed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], saying that the people of New Mexico to a man demand that those murderers shall be caught and punished. [Applause.]

The people of New Mexico on the border have been suffering like the people of Texas, like the people of Arizona, and if the Carranza régime to-day is unable to take care of conditions down there we should find it out at once and take prompt action on the matter. If they are unable to control their nationals from invading—because it is nothing else—our country, we should find it out and act accordingly. The people of New Mexico have a militia now, and undoubtedly will assist the national authorities in controlling and trying to apprehend the assassins who have committed these last outrages. [Applause.] I am waiting to-day for telegrams giving me the details of these most horrible murders. We have lost some of our people from New Mexico. In the murder committed at Santa Isabel one of our best citizens, an accountant, a man from our community, lost his life. Whatever motives Villa may have for committing these depredations and these raids upon our people we care nothing about. We assume, however, that they were committed in order to provoke this country into intervention in Mexico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. We do not care what his object may be. We can not any longer stand by any such raids as he has committed. We do not know exactly what the extent of the murders are. The dispatches through the press indicate that they are horrible enough, to say the least, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, that, as I said before, patience has already ceased to be a virtue. We are going to demand, in my belief, of Carranza either to be permitted to go with our troops into Mexico in order to apprehend Villa, or else we are going to recognize that Carranza himself is not trying to do anything to protect our fellow citizens either in Mexico or on the border. On that assumption I believe it is about time for us to act [applause], and to act according to the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Texas. I thank you, gentlemen. If I get any information regarding the outrage, or any other, I shall certainly lay it before the House with pleasure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the Clerk now read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of Lloyd C. Washburn, late of Company C, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Lucie C. Bostian, widow of Benjamin F. Bostian, late of Company L, Ninety-ninth Regiment, and Company D, One hundred and ninety-ninth Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Pearley H. Elwell, late of Company C, One hundred and twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Eliza Jane Bachtel, widow of Elijah Bachtel, late of Company B, Fifty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Mary Followill, former widow of William T. Followill, late of Company B, Eleventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Kate E. Ferguson, widow of William W. Ferguson, late of Company H, Fourth New York Heavy Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Robert Bigger, late of Company D, One hundred and sixth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Anna Harleman, former widow of Jeremiah Myers, late of Company G, Two hundred and third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Robert M. Dickson, late of Company C, Twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Oscar F. Houghland, late of Company E, Twenty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Sarah E. Ticknor, widow of Elias W. Ticknor, late of Company K, Twenty-seventh Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Isaac Thomas, late of Company G, Twelfth Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Joseph T. McCombs, late of Battery D, West Virginia Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Henry Vickers, late a landsman, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Elizabeth R. Horton, former widow of Solomon B. Hobbs, late of Company H, Fiftieth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Benjamin F. Morland, late of Company E, Forty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Mary Ballinger, widow of John Ballinger, late of Company G, First Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Frederick Rice, late of Company A, Tenth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Andrew R. Jones, late of Company D, Seventeenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Hamilton Adams, late of Company I, Fifty-third Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Mounted Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Barbara J. Ward, widow of James D. Ward, late of Company L, Sixth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Thomas Cannon, late of Company C, Fifty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, page 1, of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, by striking out lines 6 to 9, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, page 19. The soldier is dead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, strike out the paragraph from lines 3 to 6, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, on page 25. The soldier is dead.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 25, by striking out the paragraph, lines 14 to 17, inclusive.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's desk the bill H. R. 8493, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair announces the following conferees:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12207, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12207) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee arose from its last sitting the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] offered an amendment striking out the last section read. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois to discuss his amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose, not of striking out the entire section but only the paragraph relating to the Steamboat-Inspection Service which appropriates the sum of $16,440 for the Supervising Inspector General and his office. I notice, Mr. Chairman, that we are appropriating in this bill $596,000 for that bureau. I notice that further on in this bill we are appropriating nearly $200,000 for the Bureau of Navigation. I am of the opinion, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that this great sum of this appropriation is wasted, and that both of these departments can be and should be under the supervision of the Navy Department. It seems to me from evidence that was given about eight months ago in the city of Chicago that this Steamboat-Inspection Service Bureau for which we are trying to appropriate has no power or any jurisdiction to protect the public.

On the 24th day of July, 1915, when the news was flashed through the city and the country that within the heart of the city of Chicago, and only four squares from the city hall and the courthouse, nearly 1,000 of our citizens lost their lives, people all over this Nation looked with horror and dreaded to believe that such an occurrence was possible, but nevertheless, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I regret exceedingly that it was true. Instantly there was a universal demand for immediate investigation and the punishment of all those in any way responsible for this unnecessary loss of life. The State's attorney, the coroner, and the Federal district attorney started immediately to ascertain the cause of this terrible disaster, and the coroner's jury, after careful investigation, held over to the grand jury the officers of the Eastland Co., the captain and engineer of the boat and the two inspectors, Reid and Eckliff. Later on the grand jury indicted them, as did the Federal grand jury.

The Secretary of Commerce also came to Chicago and started an investigation, but as was and is believed by the people of Chicago he came with the purpose to prove that his department and these inspectors, for whom he has not been in any way responsible, were wrongfully accused and were not and could not be guilty, and that this terrible disaster and loss of life was matter of cause. I differed with him then and I differ with him now. The terrible loss of life was due mainly to negligence and carelessness of the two inspectors who are part of this bureau, first, because they issued permits granting the right to this boat Eastland to carry nearly 2,500 passengers, basing their decision on information which these inspectors secured by telephone, to the effect that certain improvements had been made and certain rafts had been placed upon the boat which justified them in granting the permit for the increase in the number of passengers to be carried.

If those inspectors had performed their duty, if they had been intelligent enough, if they had investigated the conditions of the cranky boat as those conditions should have been investigated, this disaster never could have occurred; secondly, in granting a permit to a wholly incompetent man to captain a boat they knew was hard and dangerous to handle and a man who admitted never having had any experience in managing passenger vessels. Mr. Chairman, these are not only my views, but these are the views of the grand jury that had for nearly a period of three weeks investigated the conditions that brought about this catastrophe. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that my time be extened so that this report of the grand jury of Cook County may be read by the Clerk in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for an extension of his time sufficient to permit the report of the grand jury of Cook County to be read at the desk. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report of the grand jury.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the judges of the criminal court of Cook County:

REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE GRAND JURY FOR THE JULY TERM, A. D. 1915, IN RE S. S. "EASTLAND."

Hon. GEORGE KERSTEN,
Presiding Judge of said Court:

After a careful investigation of the evidence submitted, we concluded that the immediate cause of the disaster to the steamship Eastland on July 24 was the instability of the vessel under conditions of loading; that this instability was due to one of three main causes, or any two or all of them:

First. The overloading of the vessel with passengers.
Second. The mishandling of water ballast.
Third. The construction of the vessel.

The boat came to Clark Street Dock and began to take on passengers with no ballast in her tanks, of which there were five on each side. She listed to starboard, and the engineer started to fill port tanks No. 2 and No. 3. The passengers meanwhile were crowding onto the boat, and when the load shifted so as to list the boat to port the engineer attempted to pump out tank No. 3. When the boat did right herself, he shut down the pump and attempted to fill the tanks on the starboard side, but it was too late.

At the time of the accident the No. 2 port tank was filled or partially filled, No. 3 port tank empty or nearly empty, and No. 3 starboard tank just beginning to fill. That is to say, most of the ballast was on the port side, and two or possibly three of the tanks were but partially filled, so that the water could surge with every movement of the boat and produce a condition more dangerous than if the tanks had been empty.

The handling of the ballast by the officers of the boat indicates an entire lack of understanding of the nature and proper uses of water ballast, and an absolute disregard of safety after repeated warnings and frequent indications of extreme instability.

The underlying cause of the disaster was the general construction of the vessel and that of her ballast tanks. The water-ballast system was single, permitting the filling of the tanks from one sea cock by gravity only, and made it impossible to empty some tanks while filling others or to pump from one set to another. She was unsafe for passengers unless properly ballasted, and a very imperfect system of water ballast was used when fixed ballast sufficient for proper stability should have been required by the inspectors and owners.

As actually operated, with the tanks used for trimming purposes only, the safety of the boat at all times depended, first, on the quick wit and the judgment of the engineer and the captain; second, on the operating condition of the valves, pumps, and sea cock, any of which could have easily been clogged, and thus prevented the stabilizing of the boat.

The instability of this vessel, abundantly indicated by experience, would have been easily shown by calculation or by an inclining test, and could have been easily corrected by means of fixed ballast. That it was not corrected years ago we regard as indicating criminal carelessness or incompetence on the part of all persons connected with the design, construction, control, operation, and inspection of the boat.

The fact that at various times, from the date of the construction of this boat to the time of the disaster, inspections were made by inspectors representing ship-registry companies and insurance companies for the purpose of classifying said steamship Eastland for insurance purposes, or vessel-rating purposes, are additional contributory causes to this great disaster, and add to the chain of careless, reckless, and criminally negligent inspection of boats.

The Government inspectors had authority to refuse a permit to the Eastland until such changes had been made as would have made her seaworthy under all conditions of service. It appears, however, that the most important and fundamental question of stability was never investigated by the inspectors. The steamboat inspectors are generally not trained technical men, and are therefore not competent to make reliable stability calculations or to conduct inclining tests and to make competent calculations therefrom to determine the stability of the boats inspected by them under various loading and other service conditions.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. We recommend that the Federal Government before issuing a permit for the construction of a vessel shall require the submitting of plans and necessary calculations of same for approval, and that no permit shall be issued without such approval. Such plans and calculations shall become the permanent record of the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

2. We recommend that during the construction of a vessel proper inspection shall be made of the hull construction and the construction of engine, boilers, and other equipment. Upon completion and fully equipped, the vessel shall be subjected to inclining tests and necessary calculations made therefrom to determine the safe load-carrying capacity under service conditions.

3. The stability of the vessels used in passenger service shall in no case depend upon movable ballast.

4. Water ballast shall be allowed for trimming purposes only, and when used the system shall be arranged with at least two sea cocks with pipes cross connected so that one set of tanks on one side can be filled while the other set is being pumped out, and so that water may be pumped from one set to another.

5. All pertinent data relating to stability under service conditions shall be reduced to a convenient form, and a printed copy containing necessary and desired information shall be posted in a prominent place in the pilot house of all vessels for ready reference by the officers of such vessels.

6. We recommend that definite regulations be issued by the Federal Government governing the carrying capacity of excursion and other passenger steamers, specifying the carrying of sufficient life-saving equipment, passenger space, and limiting the number of passengers that can safely be carried, such loading to be based on the stability of the vessel under service conditions.

7. We recommend that the Steamboat-Inspection Service be reorganized in a manner to make all branches coordinate and thus eliminate the confusion caused by the statutes delegating special powers and authority to subordinate branches. Such service should be provided with technically trained and experienced inspectors, all under proper, systematic control.

8. We recommend that the Steamboat-Inspection Service be transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor and be placed under the control and direction of the Navy Department of the United States, and we respectfully urge the Representatives of the State of Illinois in Congress to endeavor to secure legislation to this end.

GEORGE A. HUGHES, Foreman.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print the entire report in full, as I do not wish to detain the House unduly and as I wish to make some observations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the report of the grand jury, that has been read, clearly shows that the Eastland was not a stable boat. If the inspectors had possessed any ability or prudence, there is no doubt but that they would have been obliged to refuse a permit to that boat to carry 2,500 passengers. Not only were those inspectors negligent, reckless, careless, and incompetent, but they were guilty of issuing a permit to a captain who was no more capable of running a boat of that kind than I am myself, and I admit that I am absolutely ignorant as to how to operate one.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SABATH. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the gentleman's remedy? Does the gentleman propose to correct the condition of which he speaks by striking out the Steamboat-Inspection Service altogether?

Mr. SABATH. As I suggested, I believe it would be advisable, in view of the conditions, to eliminate not only the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection, but also the Bureau of Navigation, and put both of these bureaus under the Navy Department, where we know that there are officials who possess the knowledge, experience, and ability that would make such recurrence impossible by granting a permit to any boat like the Eastland to carry such a large number of passengers without being properly equipped for doing so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman wants to transfer what we call the Steamboat-Inspection Service from the Department of Commerce to the Navy Department? Is that the idea?

Mr. SABATH. I believe it would be of benefit to the public, and in the interest of the service. I believe we would be more adequately protected than we are under the present system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I merely suggest to the gentleman that we must have practical engineers and practical laboring men to do this kind of work.

Mr. SABATH. I believe we can have them. I maintain that these men in this branch of the Department of Commerce are not practical, and that they do not possess the necessary intelligence.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's motion is to strike out the entire paragraph, so that there shall be no Steamboat-Inspection Service at all?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, no. I believe that a careful and proper inspection service should be maintained. I believe that men like Reid and Eckliff, who had charge of that district should be eliminated from the service. I have protested to the Secretary of Commerce against the reinstatement of these men, and I desire to ask that my letter to the Secretary of Commerce, protesting against the reinstatement of these men, be made a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the letter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

CHICAGO, March 4, 1916.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication of February 29, together with the decision of the United States Court for the Western District of Michigan in the matter of Inspectors Reid and Eckliff, and I assure you I shall carefully read the court's ruling in refusing to issue warrants for all the defendants in the case.

Personally I am of the opinion (whether the court is right or wrong in denying the warrants), from the evidence that I have heard and the evidence given by these two inspectors themselves at the hearing conducted by you, that they were grossly negligent in the performance of their duty, and that they issued the license, as they admitted, upon a telephonic request, without having any evidence submitted to them that the laws had been complied with which would justify issuing the permit to carry such a large number of passengers. For that reason I feel that they should not be restored to duty, as that would be awarding a premium for recklessness and carelessness in the service, and I here enter my protest to their restoration.

Respectfully, yours, A. J. SABATH.

Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. SABATH. I should like to have a few more minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman proceed for two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Make it five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois modifies the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the letter which I have sent to the Clerk's desk to be placed in the RECORD is a letter which I forwarded a few days ago to the Secretary of Commerce protesting against the reinstatement of these two inspectors, who were in charge of that district and who have been indicted in the courts, but as to whom the Federal judge has refused to issue warrants for their extradition. I received an answer from the Secretary of Commerce, to the effect that he begs to differ with me as to my views and as to the causes of this disaster, involving these two inspectors, and stating that he feels it to be his duty to reinstate them.

If his order will stand, it means that we are placing a premium on negligence and inefficiency. Not only did these two men issue a permit without any proof that this vessel was entitled to carry the increased number of passengers, but they——

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to ask the gentleman if he is incorporating in his remarks the decision of the court?

Mr. SABATH. I am incorporating the report of the grand jury and will also insert the opinion of the court.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. BYRNS], as well as the gentleman from North Carolina, are both mistaken when they state that the inspectors have been tried and exonerated. The facts are that application has been made by the district attorney of our district, Mr. Clyne, to the authorities in the State of Michigan for a warrant of removal, which, however, has been denied by Judge Sessions, but the indictment against them in Cook County, as well as in the northern district of Illinois, still stands. The only thing that was considered by the court was whether warrants should be issued for their removal or not. The court in denying the application relied more on the technicalities than the facts and evidence. If either of these two inspectors are brought to justice and tried before any jury I feel satisfied that on their own admission, made before the coroner's jury in Cook County, they would be convicted, and my contention is shared by others. I insert part of the opinion of Judge Sessions in refusing the warrant, showing what the proceedings before Judge Sessions have been:

These defendants were indicted in both the State and the Federal courts. Several indictments other than the three upon which these proceedings are based were presented in the Federal court. But neither the commendable activity of earnest and zealous officials, the finality of the decision in this matter, if against the Government, nor the natural unwillingness of the defendants to be brought to trial in a place where at best it will be difficult to secure an impartial jury, is of any controlling moment or importance in the determination of the issues here presented. The serious consequences to follow the decision of this matter demand and require extra care in reaching a correct conclusion, but have no bearing upon the merits of the controversy.

At the outset it is important to ascertain, if possible, the exact questions to be determined. The rules of law which control and govern proceedings of this kind are reasonably well settled. Questions of either law or fact which are fairly debatable must be decided, if at all, upon the trial of these defendants and by the trial court. If more than one offense is charged in a single count of the indictments, or if a joint offense is alleged where separate offenses should have been stated, or if the indictments or any of them are merely irregular and defective in form, the issues so raised can not be determined by this tribunal but must be presented to the court in which the indictments have been returned. A large part of the testimony upon this hearing has been directed to the question of whether the Eastland rested upon the bottom or upon some obstruction in the bottom of Chicago River at the time she overturned. This question of fact can not be determined in this proceeding, but must be left to the decision of a jury at the trial.

The undisputed evidence shows and it is conceded that at the time of accident the steamer Eastland was securely tied to a dock in Chicago River at least one-half mile from Lake Michigan. Therefore it appears conclusively that the crime charged these defendants in this indictment was not committed "upon the high seas" or "out of the jurisdiction of any particular State." On the contrary, the place where the vessel overturned is within the body of Cook County and within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois. It is equally certain that the crime charged was not committed upon a vessel then on a voyage upon Lake Michigan or "any of the waters connecting" the Great Lakes. By no fiction of law or fact can Chicago River be regarded as Lake Michigan or one of the high seas. Under present laws a crime local to that river is cognizable by the courts of the State of Illinois and not by the courts of the United States. Moreover the defendants were not on board the Eastland at the time of the alleged neglect and misconduct, but were at their homes in this district in the State of Michigan. It necessarily follows that none of the defendants could possibly be found guilty under this indictment if held for trial.

The acts of defendants, which are claimed to have been an attempt to send the Eastland on a voyage across Lake Michigan on July 24, 1915, were all done, in the State of Michigan and in the regular course of business and official duty, and most of such acts are not even remotely connected with that voyage.

The statute under consideration makes the conscious or willful doing of the prohibited act an essential element of the offense therein defined. Laws are not made to entrap the unwary. While ignorance of the law excuses no man, ignorance of facts, particularly in the absence of active fault, is a complete defense in every case where knowledge or intentional wrongdoing is the gist of the crime charged.

Is the dispatching of a vessel like the Eastland on an excursion voyage from Chicago to Michigan City the sending of a ship "to sea in the coastwise trade"? The most natural and obvious meaning of the term "coastwise trade" is trade along the seacoast upon the waters of the ocean and bays and rivers opening into the ocean. With reference to such commerce, Congress seems to have used the terms "coastwise" and "coasting" interchangeably. But it is significant that the term "coasting" has been employed invariably in statutes relating to trade or commerce upon the Great Lakes, and the word "coastwise," so far as a diligent search reveals, has never been so employed. Indeed, in a number of statutes, Congress has carefully distinguished between coastwise trade upon the seas and trade upon the Great Lakes, and had employed the one expression in contradistinction to the other.

Certificate of enrollment and license was issued authorizing the steamer Eastland to be employed in carrying on the coasting and foreign trade upon the "northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States (the Great Lakes and connecting waters and the St. Lawrence River), otherwise than by sea." It is difficult to imagine how the ship could be sent to sea otherwise than by sea. The rule that the same word may have different meanings in different acts or in different parts of the same act has no application here. It is evident that Congress, by the word "sea" in these statutes, meant other bodies of water than the Great Lakes. Unless absolutely necessary to accomplish their purpose, penal statutes must be given a strict and not a strained construction.

Acts, innocent in themselves, may be parts of an unlawful conspiracy, but there must be some evidence to show that a conspiracy exists and that the acts relied upon have some relation thereto. Here such proof is wanting. After the event it is always easy to say that some one must have been careless or the trouble would not have occurred. Broad and far-reaching as the law of conspiracy is, it is neither comprehensive nor potent enough to transform, without proof, apparently innocent conduct into criminal misconduct.

The evidence in this matter wholly fails to establish probable cause for believing any of these defendants guilty of any crime charged in the indictments. The application for a warrant of removal will be denied.

C. W. SESSIONS, District Judge.

In addition to that they issued a permit to a captain and an engineer who never before that time had had any experience on any passenger vessels. The only experience that the captain had was that he had been the captain of some small lumber boat. The engineer was a new man, with hardly any experience whatever. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that both the captain and the engineer were men who had no knowledge or experience, they issued a permit granting an increase of nearly 500 passengers to be carried on this, at best a dangerous and difficult boat to handle.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind their acts were criminal, and for the department and for this House to stand by and approve the action of these men will be considered as rewarding recklessness, carelessness, and inefficiency. We from time to time rise to protest when one or two of our citizens lose their lives; but here, when nearly 1,000 of our citizens, through the carelessness and negligence of indifferent persons, lose their lives, there is no one who will demand that the people responsible for, yes, guilty of, that crime should be punished.

Believing that the people in the future will be better protected and the service improved, I believe this department, together with the Bureau of Navigation, should be placed under the Navy Department, in the decided interest of better service and for a safeguard to the public.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] in charge of the bill.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a request?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. On the 22d of February I placed in the RECORD a letter written by me to some of my constituents, and a very well known, widely known, and distinguished citizen has written a reply and asked that it be placed in the RECORD. I ask leave to place in the RECORD his reply to my letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to print in the RECORD a letter from a constituent. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is to print in the RECORD a letter from a constituent in reply to a letter which the gentleman from Texas wrote.

Mr. HARDY. It is a letter attacking my position.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there are no two bureaus in the Government which are more important, in my judgment, than the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection and the Bureau of Navigation. They have to do with the preservation of human life on our steamers. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] states that in his judgment these bureaus should be transferred to the Navy Department. They have absolutely no connection with any of the duties imposed upon the Navy Department. They are charged with the responsibility of inspecting our merchant steamers upon our lakes and rivers, and I can imagine nothing that would be more out of harmony than to place these two bureaus in the Navy Department, which has nothing to do with this subject.

The gentleman states that in his judgment the Bureau of Steamboat Inspection is responsible for the Eastland disaster, a disaster which thrilled everyone in this country with horror. It is easy to make charges of that kind. It is easy to stand here upon the floor of the House and to accuse those connected with this bureau of criminal carelessness and criminal negligence; but it would be difficult for the gentleman to present proof of that kind, especially since a court of the United States has held that there was no criminal carelessness, that there was no negligence upon the part of those connected with this arm of the Government service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has any provision been made in this bill for an increase in the number of inspectors of steamboats?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee has increased the number by 36, in fact the full number asked for by the department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These inspectors have powers that are somewhat autocratic, have they not, in that they can order people off boats or prevent the boats from sailing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely, as I understand the law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask what would be the effect of adopting the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out? Would that leave us without any Steamboat-Inspection Service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] presents an amendment which proposes to strike out that portion of the appropriation that applies to the work done here in Washington, including the head of this service, and if we strike that out it absolutely eliminates the service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There would be no Steamboat-Inspection Service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There would be no Steamboat-Inspection Service, and we would have no authority in this Government charged with the duty of inspecting vessels in order to insure the safety of human life.

Referring to the gentleman's remarks concerning the Eastland disaster, the United States district court, in a decision rendered by Mr. Justice Sessions, has adjudged that the Steamboat-Inspection Service was in no sense responsible for this disaster. The Secretary of Commerce and Gen. Uhler, Supervising Inspector General, have made a careful investigation of the matter, and they are in accord on that fact.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know whether the gentleman is familiar with the action before Judge Sessions. The charge was one of conspiracy, and the court has held that there was no evidence of any conspiracy that would justify the issuing of a warrant.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The effect of the opinion of Mr. Justice Sessions was to exonerate the two inspectors who had been indicted before his court for carelessness and negligence in the performance of their duties, with particular respect to this steamer, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that that opinion be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, so that there may be no doubt as to his holding.

Now, the Secretary of Commerce, as I have stated, made a personal visit and investigation of this matter. We all know how zealous the Secretary of Commerce is in the performance of his duties. No department chief has taken a greater and more personal interest in the duties of his department, and in the duties of the various buredus in that department, than the present Secretary of Commerce. I dare say there has never been a head of a department more familiar with all the various details of his department and the work accomplished by it than the present Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield. He has stated, and also Gen. Uhler, long the efficient head of this service, and who is a practical steamship engineer of many years' practical experience, after a careful investigation, has stated, that the Steamboat-Inspection Service was in no sense responsible for that terrible disaster.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The real cause of that accident was that the water-ballast tanks were empty, and as the report of the grand jury, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has read into the RECORD, shows, there was possibly an error made by the engineer or the man in charge of the boat in undertaking, as he did, to fill those ballast tanks. The report which the gentleman had read itself exonerates the steamboat inspectors, because the grand jury held that the sinking of that vessel was due possibly to three causes: First, possibly the overloading of the boat with passengers; second, the mishandling of the water ballast; and, third, the faulty construction of that vessel. Now, the Secretary of Commerce was asked concerning this disaster while before the committee, and in justice to him, and in justice to this great service, I want to read to you what he had to say about it.

He was asked by Mr. SISSON:

Mr. SISSON. Did you personally visit the scene of the Eastland disaster?

Secretary REDFIELD. Yes, sir; and I wish that every word of that whole Eastland matter could be put before the public eye, where the full light of truth could be thrown on it. Nothing would be more gratifying to me and nothing would be more honorable to the service than to have that thing done. I personally brought the inspectors who examined the Eastland from outside of the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois into that jurisdiction purposely in order that they might be given the fullest opportunity for examination, and that matter is now in the courts. Those two inspectors have been suspended without pay pending the result of the investigation; but of the ultimate outcome we have no doubt or fear whatever. We know perfectly well what was the cause of that great disaster. Within three hours after the vessel went down the chief engineer put in writing the reason why it went down, and it was filed with our service, and I assume it is now before the courts in testimony.

Mr. STAFFORD. The failure of the stopcock to work caused it, did it not?

Secretary REDFIELD. No, sir; the ballast tanks were empty.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understood the testimony of the engineer, they knew that they were empty, but that when he tried to fill them the stopcocks refused to let water in.

Secretary REDFIELD. They let it in, but they let it in in such a way that it heeled the vessel over. She was already heeling. The port lights, which were only 20 inches above the water, were open, and when she heeled they let the water in. Gen. Uhler can tell you about this. The facts, I think, are known to all maritime men, and they are perfectly clear. There is nothing in the Eastland disaster, certainly, which reflects in the faintest degree upon the character of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, nor was there anything done in the Eastland matter that I would not do over again as it was done. The community was naturally excited and in a state of hysteria, and I can not blame them for that. We caused the strictest examination to be made into the service, both from within and from without. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States was asked to have their committee on this service obtain special counsel to examine into it, and they have done so. Mr. N. Sumner Myrick is that counsel, and we have turned over to him every record of the service and thrown open our desks to him, and he is going from office to office all over the country studying the service.

Further on he was asked by Mr. SISSON:

Mr. SISSON. That disaster to the Eastland was not in any wise caused by the inadequacy of this service, and it could not have been prevented by you with ten times the number of inspectors, could it?

Secretary REDFIELD. No, sir; that had nothing to do with the service.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. But my question is with reference to what the gentleman has just read. If the statement of the Secretary of Commerce to the effect that they do not need any more inspectors is true, why did the committee recommend 30 more?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is not exactly in line with what I am trying to state, but undoubtedly they need more inspectors, because, as a matter of fact, the inspectors have been required to work from 14 to 18 hours a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, the gentleman knows that men who are required to work from 14 to 18 hours a day are in no condition to give the very best service in the performance of their duty. Now, the Secretary of Commerce says that the fact that they did not have a sufficient number of inspectors had nothing whatever to do with this accident.

Mr. MADDEN. I have had some experience with steamboats myself, and my observation is, regardless of what the law may be, that it is the duty of the inspectors to traverse every part of the boat, boilers, engine room, water tanks, ballast tanks, or machinery and hull—everything—to see that the boat is in proper shape. It is evident that no such inspection of this boat was made at the time. It is true the Secretary of Commerce did go to Chicago and made an investigation, but he was very unfortunate in the manner of his investigation. He gave no evidence of any sympathy with the mourners, whose families were lying dead on the docks and in the morgue and on the street. On the contrary, he gave evidence of a cold-blooded disinterestedness in connection with the whole affair that appalled the people of Chicago. While I have no disposition to deny the fact that he did endeavor to make an investigation, or at least did make such as he thought he ought to make, he should have had some sympathetic feelings for the people of Chicago who had lost their families in this appalling disaster, but he gave no such evidence. Chicago has just reason to resent the attitude of the Secretary of Commerce in connection with this matter.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the gentleman from Illinois does not desire to do the Secretary of Commerce an injustice. We all know the Secretary, and I think it is the unanimous judgment of those who know him that he has a most kindly, sympathetic nature. I am sure that whatever may have been his action while there on a strictly official matter, seeking to learn the truth, he did sympathize deeply and sincerely with those in distress. It is too much to say, it is unjust to say, that the Secretary of Commerce or any other man did not sympathize with those who were plunged into distress on account of that great disaster.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee that the Secretary of Commerce began his investigation by the announcement in advance of obtaining any information whatever as a result of the investigation that no fault could be found with the inspection service and that no man connected with that service could be considered at fault because of a failure to perform his duty. Now, that is the way he began the investigation of an important matter like this.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And he is supported by the fact that the investigation has developed that the real cause of that great disaster was the fact that the water ballast tanks were empty and had been emptied for the purpose of getting the steamer nearer to the dock, and then when they undertook to fill them the water poured through the port holes, which were only 20 inches above the surface and open, because of the fact that the vessel was made to keel over by the manner in which these ballast tanks were filled. It is impossible to have an inspector on every ship or steamer at all times, and therefore the Steamboat-Inspection Service is not responsible for what the engineer may have done or for some error of judgment on his part.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to state for the gentleman's information that there were two inspectors at the ship, and they did not perform their duty.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, and although I always value his opinion very highly I can not agree with him in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object—which I shall not do—I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It is now a quarter past 2 o'clock, Friday afternoon, and we have not as yet read one line of this bill. I desire to ask him whether it is the expectation to insist that the House shall stay late to-night for the purpose of finishing the bill or whether the gentleman expects to rise about the usual time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I had hoped that the House would stay here as long as possible.

Mr. MANN. I am quite willing to stay, but I am not willing to stay here and hear hot air all the afternoon. I am willing to hear all that gentlemen want to say if thereby they do not detain me too late to-night.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would not have asked for this extension, Mr. Chairman, but I have been interrupted, and I merely want to get this further extract from the hearings into the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object to the gentleman's extension. A number of other gentlemen desire to be heard upon this. I think that perhaps this and other matters are important enough not to attempt to say that we are going to wind up this bill with the Borland amendment in it to-night. You can not do it unless you stay all evening.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely too cautious to say that I was going to wind it up to-night, because I know that is not within my power. Continuing from the record, Mr. Chairman, Secretary Redfield interposed a question to Gen. Uhler while he was testifying before the committee, as follows, and I read from then on:

Secretary REDEFIELD. Suppose you had had your portholes wide open 3 feet above the water line?

Mr. UHLER. Well, the water would have come in, that is all, if there was nobody there to shut them up.

Secretary REDFIELD. And that was shown in the Eastland case.

Mr. UHLER. And the statement is that she had no water in her ballast tanks?

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not that fact have been shown if she had been inspected, that she had no water in her tanks?

Mr. UHLER. Mr. Stafford, I would like to answer that question by asking another one. We provide for the inspection of the boilers and we inspect boilers and we say that the boilers are safe up to a certain pressure. Now, a boiler to be safe must have water in it, but if you start a fire under a boiler that has no water in it you are going to have some trouble, and it is impossible for the Steamboat-Inspection Service to detail a man on every steamer to see whether or not they have water enough in the boilers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it was not the fault of the inspection service——

Mr. UHLER (interposing). It was not the fault of the inspection service that they did not have water in the ballast tanks.

I desire to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that every investigation that has been made on the part of those connected with this service exonerates the Steamboat-Inspection Service. A United States judge, Mr. Justice Sessions, sitting in his court in the western district of Michigan, exonerated the steamboat inspectors from any liability on account of that disaster, and I ask unanimous consent that I may insert as a part of my remarks the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Sessions in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the opinion of Judge Sessions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES V. GEORGE T. ARNOLD, WILLIAM H. HULL, ROBERT REID, CHARLES C. ECKLIFF, HARRY PEDERSEN, AND JOSEPH M. ERICKSON, DEFENDANTS.

(In the district court of the United States for the western district of Michigan, southern division.)

The six defendants above named reside in this judicial district. The Government seeks to remove them to the northern district of Illinois for trial upon three indictments returned by the grand jury of that district. These criminal proceedings grow out of an appalling disaster which occurred on the morning of July 24, 1915, in the city of Chicago, and was caused by the overturning or capsizing of the steamer Eastland at one of the docks in Chicago River. At the time of the accident the vessel was about to start upon an excursion voyage to Michigan City, Ind., and had on board 2,500 passengers and a crew of 70 seamen. More than 800 persons lost their lives.

The defendants Arnold and Hull are respectively the president and vice president and general manager of the Michigan corporation which owned the Eastland. The defendants Reid and Eckliff were United States local inspectors of steamboats in the district of Michigan, the former being inspector of hulls and the latter inspector of boilers. The defendants Pedersen and Erickson were respectively captain and chief engineer of the ill-fated vessel.

The magnitude and far-reaching effects of the catastrophe naturally excited great interest therein and aroused intensely bitter feeling against all persons connected with the ownership, operation, and navigation of the boat. Federal and State authorities vied with each other in their efforts to investigate the affair and to prosecute all persons thought to be responsible therefor. These defendants were indicted in both the State and Federal courts. Several indictments other than the three upon which these proceedings are based were presented in the Federal courts. But neither the commendable activity of earnest and zealous officials, the finality of the decision in this matter, if against the Government, nor the natural unwillingness of the defendants to be brought to trial in a place where at best it will be difficult to secure an impartial jury, is of any controlling moment or importance in the determination of the issues here presented. The serious consequences to follow the decision of this matter demand and require extra care in reaching a correct conclusion but have no bearing upon the merits of the controversy.

At the outset, it is important to ascertain, if possible, the exact questions to be determined. The rules of law which control and govern proceedings of this kind are reasonably well settled. Questions of either law or fact which are fairly debatable must be decided, if at all, upon the trial of these defendants and the trial court. If more than one offense is charged in a single count of the indictments, or if a joint offense is alleged where separate offenses should have been stated, or if the indictments or any of them are merely irregular and defective in form, the issues so raised can not be determined by this tribunal but must be presented to the court in which the indictments have been returned. A large part of the testimony upon this hearing has been directed to the question of whether the Eastland rested upon the bottom or upon some obstruction in the bottom of the Chicago River at the time she overturned. This question of fact can not be determined in this proceeding but must be left to the decision of a jury at the trial. The issues here presented are thus narrowed to two: Does any count in the indictments charge and do the proved facts establish the commission of a crime against the United States, triable in the Federal courts of the northern district of Illinois? And, does the evidence, including the indictments themselves, show that there is probable cause to believe the defendants, or some of them, guilty of the crime so charged? Manifestly, if the indictments do not charge an offense against the United States, or if the established facts show conclusively that no such offense has been committed, or, if committed, that it is not triable in the district to which removal is sought, the defendants can not be sent from their homes to another jurisdiction to be put upon trial. On the other hand, it is equally true that the defendants can not be removed from this district to the northern district of Illinois for trial unless the evidence here produced fairly shows probable cause for believing them guilty of some offense charged against them. (U. S. Rev. Stat., 1014; Tinsley v. Treat, 205 U. S., 20; Benson v. Henkel, 198 U. S., 1–10; Henry v. Henkel, 235 U. S., 219; Hyde v. Shine, 199 U. S., 62; Beavers v. Henkel, 194 U. S., 73; Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S., 249; Pierce v. Creecy, 210 U. S., 387, 401; Beavers v. Haubert, 198 U. S., 77–90; U. S. v. Burr, 25 Fed. Cas., 13.)

The meaning of the term "probable cause," as here used, means clear and plain, yet in reality it is not easily defined with exact accuracy. The most favorable definition or construction of the term which can be claimed by the Government is that to constitute probable cause there must be such evidence concerning the essential elements of the specific crime charged as to induce the belief of the guilt of the defendants in the minds of honest and reasonable men. Or, to state the matter in another way, if this were a trial upon the merits by a jury and, under the law and the evidence, the court would be required to direct a verdict in favor of the accused, it can not be said that probable cause has been established.

The first indictment, in each of its two counts, charges the defendants jointly with a direct violation of the provisions of section 282 of the Penal Code:

"Every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on any steamboat or vessel, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duties on such vessel the life of any person is destroyed, and every owner, charterer, inspector, or other public officer, through whose fraud, neglect, connivance, misconduct, or violation of law the life of any person is destroyed, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That when the owner or charterer of any steamboat or vessel shall be a corporation, any executive officer of such corporation, for the time being actually charged with the control and management of the operation, equipment, or navigation of such steamboat or vessel, who has knowingly and willfully caused or allowed such fraud, neglect, connivance, misconduct, or violation of law, by which the life of any person is destroyed, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both."

Leaving out of consideration the serious question of whether a captain and chief engineer mentioned in the first clause, inspectors mentioned in the second clause, and executive officers of the owner corporation mentioned in the proviso of this section, can be charged jointly with the commission of a single offense, it is important to note that section 282 is expressly and positively limited by section 272 of the Penal Code, the relevant provisions of which are as follows:

"The crime and offenses defined in this chapter shall be punished as herein prescribed:

"First. When committed upon the high seas, or on any other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State, or when committed within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States and out of the jurisdiction of any particular State on board any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States or any citizen thereof, or to any corporation created by or under the laws of the United States, or of any State, Territory, or District thereof.

"Second. When committed upon any vessel registered, licensed, or enrolled under the laws of the United States, and being on a voyage upon the waters of any of the Great Lakes, namely: Lake Superior, Lake Michigan, Lake Huron, Lake St. Clair, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, or any of the waters connecting any of said lakes, or upon the River St. Lawrence, where the same constitutes the international boundary line."

The undisputed evidence shows and it is conceded that, at the time of accident, the steamer Eastland was securely tied to a dock in Chicago River at least one-half mile from Lake Michigan. Therefore it appears conclusively that the crime charged against these defendants in this indictment was not committed "upon the high seas" or "out of the jurisdiction of any particular State." On the contrary, the place where the vessel overturned is within the body of Cook County and within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois. It is equally certain that the crime charged was not committed upon a vessel then on a voyage upon Lake Michigan or "any of the waters connecting" the Great Lakes. By no fiction of law or fact can Chicago River be regarded as Lake Michigan or one of the high seas. Under present laws, a crime local to that river is cognizable by the courts of the State of Illinois and not by the courts of the United States. (United States v. Rogers, 47 Fed. Rep., 1.) Moreover, the defendants, Arnold, Hull, Reid, and Elkliff, were not on board the Eastland at the time of the alleged neglect and misconduct but were at their homes in this district in the State of Michigan. It necessarily follows that none of the defendants could possibly be found guilty under this indictment if held for trial.

The second indictment, in each of its first and third counts, charges the defendants with a direct violation of the provisions of section 4561 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of Congress of December 21, 1898. The last clause of said section as so amended reads as follows:

"If any person knowingly sends or attempts to send or is a party to the sending or attempting to send an American ship to sea, in the foreign or coastwise trade, in such an unseaworthy state that the life of any person is likely to be thereby endangered, he shall, in respect of each offense, be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment not to exceed five years, or both, at the discretion of the court, unless he proves that either he used all reasonable means to insure her being sent to sea in a seaworthy state, or that her going to sea in an unseaworthy state was, under the circumstances, reasonable and justifiable, and for the purposes of giving that proof he may give evidence in the same manner as any other witness."

Again passing by the problem of whether, in the absence of a charge of conspiracy, the defendants can be held liable jointly for the separate and independent acts of the several individuals, the first question which presents itself is this: Do the acts alleged and set forth in these two counts of the indictment, and shown by the evidence, constitute an attempt to send the steamer Eastland on a voyage across Lake Michigan from the port of Chicago to the port of Michigan City? What constitutes an attempt to commit a crime?

The rule is well settled that an act, or series of acts, to amount to an attempt to commit a crime must be directly and not remotely connected with the commission of such crime and must be done in part execution of the crime and not merely in preparation for its commission. The purchase of a gun and ammunition with the intent to shoot and kill another does not amount to an attempt to commit the crime of murder. The procuring of a burglar's outfit for the purpose of breaking into a dwelling house and stealing does not constitute an attempt to commit the crime of burglary. Arming or outfitting a ship with the avowed future purpose of sailing the seas under the black flag and preying upon unarmed merchant vessels is not an attempt to commit piracy, at least so long as the ship remains inoffensively moored to her dock in harbor. These are acts merely of preparation and not of execution of crime. The acts of defendants, Arnold, Hull, Reid, and Eckliff, which are claimed to have been an attempt to send the Eastland on a voyage across Lake Michigan on July 24, 1915, were all done in the State of Michigan and in the regular course of business and official duty, and most of such acts are not even remotely connected with that voyage. What possible relation existed between the purchase of the steamer Eastland in 1914 and a proposed voyage of that steamer under a charter not made until July, 1915? What connection has been shown between the application for inspection and license, the several inspections and the certificates issued in 1914 and in the spring of 1915 and the specific voyage mentioned in the indictment? The chartering of the boat to another corporation and the letters written and the directions given to the captain were at most very remote acts of preparation. Engineer Erickson had nothing to do with chartering or navigating the ship. He had no control over her load. His station was in the engine room, deep in her hold, and in the place of greatest danger. His supreme duty was implicit obedience to the orders of her master. In view of these conditions it is difficult to see how he can be justly accused of the crime here charged against him. Under the authorities there is at least ample room for doubt that the acts of Capt. Pedersen on the morning of July 24, 1915, in preparing the vessel for the excursion trip, in permitting passengers to come on board and in giving the last command to "stand by," which meant no more than "attention," or "be ready," constituted in law an attempt to send the ship on her voyage. The boat remained tied to the dock and no effort was made to release her from her mooring either before or after the discovery of the danger. As to the other defendants, this indictment does not allege and the evidence does not establish the substance, or even the semblance of a criminal attempt. (People v. Youngs, 122 Mich., 292; McDade v. People, 29 Mich., 49; U. S. v. Stephens, 12 Fed. Rep., 52; State v. Hurley (Vt.), 6 L. R. A. (N. S.), 804; People v. Murray, 14 Cal., 160; 8 Ruling Case Law, 278, 279.)

Was the steamer Eastland unseaworthy within the purview of this statute; and if so, did the defendants have knowledge of her unseaworthiness? It is alleged in the indictment that the vessel was unseaworthy in that she was topheavy and "cranky" and in that her water-ballast system and apparatus were defective and insufficient, both in construction and in operation. Aside from the fact that the vessel capsized and the testimony of one witness, whose theories are shown to be incorrect by actual experience and indisputable facts, there is no satisfactory evidence to sustain these allegations of the indictment. Every other witness competent to testify upon the subject has said that the ship, if properly handled and navigated, was seaworthy and was capable of carrying in safety the number of people on board of her at the time of the accident. She was not in a leaky condition and was not lacking in necessary and proper equipment. She was constructed with water-ballast tanks, and if a sufficient number of the tanks had been filled with permanent water ballast, she would not have been topheavy with any load which she was authorized to carry. But if it be conceded that the Eastland may have been unseaworthy, there is nothing to indicate that the defendants either knew or ought to have known that she was "in such an unseaworthy state that the life of any person was likely to be thereby endangered." For 12 years this vessel had been navigating the Great Lakes in the excursion trade and had carried hundreds of thousands of people. During all that time, so far as appears, she had never met with an accident or a mishap which resulted in injury to or the loss of the life of any person. During the first three seasons of her career she was licensed and permitted to carry from 2,800 to 3,300 passengers, and upon several occasions was loaded to her limit. In later seasons she was authorized to carry from 1,200 to 2,200 people, the number depending upon the condition and quantity of her life-saving equipment. Her water-ballast system and apparatus had not been changed since she was built, and, unless defective in original design and construction, was in perfect working condition. Under these circumstances no one can say that the owners, managers, navigators, and official inspectors of this steamer were not justified in believing that she was seaworthy. The statute under consideration makes the conscious or willful doing of the prohibited act an essential element of the offense therein defined. Laws are not made to entrap the unwary. While ignorance of the law excuses no man, ignorance of facts, particularly in the absence of active fault, is a complete defense in every case where knowledge or intentional wrongdoing is the gist of the crime charged. (8 Ruling Case Law, 122.)

Is the dispatching of a vessel like the Eastland on an excursion voyage from Chicago to Michigan City the sending of a ship "to sea in the coastwise trade"? The most natural and obvious meaning of the term "coastwise trade" is trade along the seacoast upon the waters of the ocean and bays and rivers opening into the ocean. With reference to such commerce, Congress seems to have used the terms "coastwise" and "coasting" interchangeably. But it is significant that the term "coasting" has been employed invariably in statutes relating to trade or commerce upon the Great Lakes and the word "coastwise," so far as a diligent search reveals, has never been so employed. Indeed, in a number of statutes Congress has carefully distinguished between coastwise trade upon the seas and trade upon the Great Lakes and has employed the one expression in contradistinction to the other. (U. S. Rev. Stat., secs. 4318, 4401, 4467, 4490, and 3095; act of June 9, 1874, 6 Fed. Stat. Ann., 850; sec. 13 of act of Mar. 4, 1915, 38 Stat. L., 1169.)

Both the history and the context of this statute indicate that it was not intended to apply to ships navigating the waters of the Great Lakes. All doubt, however, upon this subject is set at rest by a reference to and an examination of section 4318 of the Revised Statutes pursuant to which the steamer Eastland was enrolled and licensed:

"Any vessel of the United States navigating the waters on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, otherwise than by sea, shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as other vessels; such enrollment and license shall authorize any such vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade on such frontiers, and no certificate of registry shall be required for vessels so employed. Such vessel shall be, in every other respect, liable to the regulations and penalties relating to registered and licensed vessels."

In conformity to the provisions of the statute above quoted, a consolidated certificate of enrollment and license was issued authorizing the steamer Eastland to be employed in carrying on the coasting and foreign trade upon the "northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States (the Great Lakes and connecting waters and the St. Lawrence River), otherwise than by sea." It is difficult to imagine how the ship could be sent to sea otherwise than by sea. The rule that the same word may have different meanings in different acts or in different parts of the same act has no application here. It is evident that Congress, by the word "sea" in these statutes, meant other bodies of water than the Great Lakes. Unless absolutely necessary to accomplish their purpose, penal statutes must be given a strict and not a strained construction.

Each of the remaining counts of the indictments charges a criminal conspiracy. Little need be said upon this subject. There is no proof which tends, even in slight degree, to fasten such guilt upon any of the respondents. A conspiracy is a combination or agreement to do an unlawful act or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. In either case a wicked combination is the essence of the crime. An agreement to be criminally negligent can scarcely be imagined. A combination of these defendants to destroy human life is both unbelievable and unthinkable. A conspiracy to commit an impossible crime is itself an impossibility. Every act charged and proved against these respondents was done in the usual and ordinary course of business, and is more consistent with innocence than with guilt. Many of them were required by law. None of them is shown to be otherwise than innocent. All of them considered together utterly fail to show a meeting of corrupt minds to accomplish an unlawful purpose. Can anyone reasonably contend that the purchase of the Eastland for $150,000 in the spring of 1914 was a part of a criminal conspiracy to defraud or to violate the laws of the United States? Is it possible to believe that the applications for inspection and license made by the manager and captain of the vessel in the customary way, the repeated inspections made by the local inspectors in the performance of their duty and as required by law, the chartering of the vessel for a voyage in her usual trade, the navigation of the ship by the captain pursuant to the directions of his employers, and the obedience of the chief engineer to the orders of the master of the ship were all parts of or done in furtherance of a wicked scheme to destroy human life? Acts, innocent in themselves, may be parts of an unlawful conspiracy, but there must be some evidence to show that a conspiracy exists and that the acts relied upon have some relation thereto. Here such proof is wanting. After the event it is always easy to say that some one must have been careless or the trouble would not have occurred. Broad and far-reaching as the law of conspiracy is, it is neither comprehensive nor potent enough to transform, without proof, apparently innocent conduct into criminal misconduct.

The dead can not be restored to life. The sorrows of the living can not be lessened by claiming other victims The majesty of the law can not be upheld and vindicated by forcing men from their homes to stand trial among strangers upon accusations which there is barely a scintilla of proof to sustain. The evidence in this matter wholly fails to establish probable cause for believing any of these defendants guilty of any crime charged in the indictments. The application for a warrant of removal will be denied.

C. W. SESSIONS, District Judge.

Dated, February 18, 1916.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has seen fit to disparage and criticize the Steamboat-Inspection Service. His remarks evidently were prompted by the horrible disaster in Chicago in the sinking of the steamship Eastland. As a resident of that city his sympathies were aroused in the interest of his people, and particularly with the families of those whose members were lost in this tragic calamity. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has referred to the hearings before his committee in exoneration of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, from which it appears that Secretary Redfield and the supervising inspector, Gen. Uhler, have, after careful and detailed investigation, exonerated the local inspectors from any blame in connection with this tragedy. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] also referred to an opinion by a Federal judge, and has obtained leave to insert it as a part of his remarks; I desire, however, for the information of the House to read just a brief extract from that decision. There were six men indicted in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan, and those men were the president and the vice president of the company owning the steamship Eastland; Robert Reid and Charles C. Eckliff, the United States local inspectors; and the captain and chief engineer of the steamer. A motion was made by the Government to remove this case from the district court of Michigan to the northern district of Illinois. Judge Sessions, who rendered the opinion, and who appears not only to be an impartial but an able judge, used this language, which bears directly upon the attack upon the Steamboat-Inspection Service in connection with this disaster:

Was the steamer Eastland unseaworthy within the purview of this statute and, if so, did the defendants have knowledge of her unseaworthiness? It is alleged in the indictment that the vessel was unseaworthy in that she was topheavy and "cranky" and in that her water ballast system and apparatus were defective and insufficient, both in construction and in operation. Aside from the fact that the vessel capsized and the testimony of one witness whose theories are shown to be incorrect by actual experience and indisputable facts, there is no satisfactory evidence to sustain these allegations of the indictment. Every other witness, competent to testify upon the subject, has said that the ship, if properly handled and navigated, was seaworthy and was capable of carrying in safety the number of people on board of her at the time of the accident. She was not in a leaky condition and was not lacking in necessary and proper equipment. She was constructed with water-ballast tanks, and if a sufficient number of the tanks had been filled with permanent water ballast she would not have been topheavy with any load which she was authorized to carry. But if it be conceded that the Eastland may have been unseaworthy, there is nothing to indicate that the defendants either knew or ought to have known that she was "in such an unseaworthy state that the life of any person was likely to be thereby endangered." For 12 years this vessel had been navigating the Great Lakes in the excursion trade and had carried hundreds of thousands of people. During all that time, so far as appears, she had never met with an accident or a mishap which resulted in injury to or the loss of life of any person. During the first three seasons of her career she was licensed and permitted to carry from 2,800 to 3,300 passengers and upon several occasions was loaded to her limit. In later seasons she was authorized to carry from 1,200 to 2,200 people, the number depending upon the condition and quantity of her life-saving equipment. Her water-ballast system and apparatus had not been changed since she was built and, unless defective in original design and construction, was in perfect working condition. Under these circumstances, no one can say that the owners, managers, navigators, and official inspectors of this steamer were not justified in believing that she was seaworthy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, that opinion was rendered by a judge having all the evidence before him embraced in the ex parte presentation of the case by the Government. Presumably all the evidence affecting the guilt of these local inspectors was before this judge when he analyzed it and rendered this opinion, and I desired to read it in order that the House might know that there had been a careful judicial investigation bearing upon the criticism of these local inspectors.

Mr. Chairman, the Steamboat-Inspection Service has been growing in efficiency all these years. Everyone who lives upon navigable waters knows something of the duties of the local inspectors of steamboats, divided into two classes, inspectors of hulls and inspectors of boilers.

I doubt if there are among all the employees of the Government a class of men who in experience, in judgment, in training, and fitness for their duties, are better equipped than the local steamboat inspectors throughout the country, and these two men, after what appears to have been an impartial and careful investigation by the proper officials in the department, after the Government had presented all of the evidence which it had to the court bearing upon their guilt, have been exonerated by their superior officers, exonerated by an impartial judge, who considered all the evidence; and I submit that it is not fair to the department, that it is not fair to these men who are not here to defend themselves to make charges not only of inefficiency but of such gross carelessness as has been made against them in the performance of their duties. This service is entitled to the commendation of the people of the country. It is entitled to be exonerated by this House, just as a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, after a careful investigation and hearing, has stated through the chairman of that subcommittee, and there is no fault which can properly lie against the record of these local steamboat inspectors.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the legislative program of the House, as I understand, provides for the consideration of rural credits early next month. The Banking and Currency Committee has been at work on the administration bill, known as the Moss or joint committee bill; and while it may be better to wait and see what kind of a bill will be finally reported before discussing this question, yet my position upon rural credits and my fight for direct Government aid have been recently attacked by my enemies, and I have been so grossly and maliciously misrepresented that I feel, in justice to myself, I should make a statement of my position thereon and recount my activities on this question.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that when I became a Member of this body, commencing with the last Congress, I was appointed to the Banking and Currency Committee. I was much gratified at this appointment, not only because that committee was to take up and revise the banking and currency laws of the country, but I saw an opportunity to make a vigorous effort to get action on the demands of the American farmer for a proper rural-credits agency. When the committee came to the consideration of the banking and currency bill it will be remembered that I insisted with all the force at my command that we should provide in that bill agencies whereby, under Government control and with direct Government aid, the American farmer could be provided an agency that would enable him to secure his capital funds at a low rate of interest, on long terms, and repayable in small annual installments. I still think that rural credits should have gone hand in hand with the banking and currency act, but others, including the President, took the position that we should take up rural credits as a separate proposition, and my efforts were defeated at that time. The President, in a newspaper statement, said:

> The scope and character of the bill, its immediate and chief purpose, could not be made to reach as far as the special interests of the farmer require. Special machinery and a distinct system of banking must be provided for if rural credits are to be successfully and adequately supplied.

The President's objections, it will thus be seen, did not go to rural credits, but to including it in the banking and currency act. He recognized the duty that we owed to the American farmer to redeem the party pledge, and in discussing the necessity for rural-credits legislation, and pointing out the serious disadvantages under which the American farmer is laboring, he said:

> One of the chief and most serious of these disadvantages has been that he has not been able to secure the extended bank accommodations he every year stands in need of without paying the most burdensome rates of interest and saddling himself with mortgages and obligations of every kind, which he fairly staggered under, if he could carry them at all. In other countries systems of rural credit have been put into operation which have not only relieved the farmer but have put his enterprises upon a footing of easy accomplishment. Countries in which agriculture was fatally languishing, because wholly unprofitable, have seen their farming lands blossom again and their people turn once more hopefully to the soil for a living. Our farmers must have similar means afforded them of handling their financial needs easily and inexpensively. They should be furnished these facilities before their enterprises languish, not afterwards. And they will be. This is our next great task and duty.

While I was disappointed at our failure to include rural credits in the banking and currency act, I was much gratified at the statement of the President that he regarded the passage of a rural-credits act as our next great task and duty and his pledge that he would urge Congress to discharge this duty. It will be recalled how persistent were my efforts at the last Congress to have Congress take up the question and grant the demands of the American farmer. In the closing hours of the last session of Congress those of us who favored rural-credits legislation succeeded in having added to the Agricultural appropriation bill in the Senate an amendment known as the McCumber amendment. When the bill came back to the House with this amendment of the Senate to it I then urged, it will be recalled, that the House concur in this Senate amendment as being the only chance that we had at that session for rural-credits legislation. It was proposed in the House that what was known as the Hollis-Bulkley bill be adopted as a substitute for the McCumber proposition, but I opposed the so-called Hollis-Bulkley bill because it provided for an expensive, cumbersome, land-bank scheme and not direct Government aid, which organized farmers had demanded and which I, from a study of the question, had become convinced was necessary to relieve the American farmer. Those of us who held the same view that I did on the question did the best we could, but we were voted down and the bill was sent to a conference between the two Houses.

The conferees on the part of the House and the part of the Senate could not agree, and finally reported back a proposition to have a special joint committee of the two Houses appointed to frame a bill to be reported at this session of Congress, which was done. I was not a member of that joint committee and had nothing to do with the writing of the bill, which it finally reported to this House at this session and which is known as the joint committee or Moss bill. As soon as this bill was reported by this joint committee and, on behalf of the committee, was introduced by Mr. Moss in this House and then referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a member, I at once, in the first public meeting which the committee held to consider the bill, pointed out my objections to it and told the committee that it was unsatisfactory and was not what I wanted. Among the objections that I pointed out was a provision of the bill which would have made each farmer liable for the loans of all other borrowers in his local association. I considered this requirement of joint liability as being vicious, unnecessary, and one that the American farmer would not submit to, and I told the committee that I would never stand for any bill that carried such a provision. Some of the farm papers of the country took up the fight that I was making on this question and expressed themselves very vigorously on it. Among these criticisms was one by the Southern Ruralist, which, in its editorial criticism of the Moss or joint committee bill, said:

> It contains a clause which in effect would make every farmer who borrows from any given rural credits bank or association responsible for the loans of every other person borrowing from the same institution. The only excuse for such a provision is that it is found in some of the European systems. * * * Its application must always be confined to localities where the population is so dense and social conditions are such that every person in the community knows the business and life of every other person. It is un-American, it is impracticable, it won't work, and we won't have it.

This same argument, with others, had been used by me in my fight on this provision in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and it was upon my motion that such a provision was stricken from the bill.

There are a great many other objections to this so-called joint committee or Moss bill, but I shall not discuss them now, because I sincerely hope that when the matter comes up in the House we shall be able to agree upon and pass an entirely different bill, one along the lines that has been demanded by organized farmers, a simple, direct, Government-aid bill without expensive machinery and cumbersome requirements upon the farmers, and I will not be satisfied with any other kind of a bill nor will the organized farmers of the South and West, in whose behalf I have been making this fight. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I realize that I have displeased some by my persistency for legislation of this kind. I realized when I took up this fight that I would be sneered at and misrepresented, but as I read the history of this country, every economic policy that Congress has enacted for a hundred years has had for its prime purpose the prosperity, the security, and the welfare of the manufacturing interests of the country, and too long has the interest of the farmer and those who toil been neglected. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that if a Member of this House will think only of the business interests of the country and work only for the welfare of the captains of industry who pride themselves on being "common-sense business men," he will be referred to in flattering terms as a statesman, but, on the other hand, if he demands equality of treatment and justice and fair play for the farmers and those who toil, immediately those who think only of "big business" will sneer at him and refer to him as a demagogue and characterize his efforts as buncombe. I realize that those of us who are fighting for this much needed legislation for the farmer will be misrepresented and abused. I myself, at the present time, am paying the penalty of having made a fight for relief of the farmers of this country. One who is opposing me has misrepresented and maliciously attacked me for this fight, by paid advertisements in the newspapers in my district. Realizing that the farmers of my district appreciated my earnest, sincere efforts in their behalf, he sought to mislead them and arouse in them a feeling of distrust by telling them that I claimed to be the author of the so-called Moss or joint committee bill. Of course it was easy for me to prove the falsity of any such misrepresentation, but with a reckless disregard for the facts, he continues to charge that I am supporting a bill which the organized farmers of the country regard as unsatisfactory. Of course, to you, Mr. Chairman, and to my colleagues upon the committee, such a charge as this is ridiculous and false. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of common knowledge here that I have been charged with too vigorously opposing this bill in the committee. As I said, my enemies and their hired agents sent among the farmers, are trying to make it appear that I am supporting a bill which organized farmers of my country oppose. As a matter of fact, I have at all times worked in perfect harmony with the organized farmers, and recently when the president and secretary of the National Farmers' Union and their legislative committee were here in Washington, they were kind enough to express their appreciation of my efforts in behalf of the farmers and the position that I have taken upon the Moss or joint committee bill. The charge that I am supporting a bill which this great organization has condemned is shown to be false by a letter recently written to me by Hon. C. S. Barrett, president of the National Farmers' Union, which I read:

FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
Union City, Ga., January 18, 1916.

Hon. OTIS WINGO,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WINGO: Not being able to see you before leaving the city, I am writing to urge you to continue the fight which you and two or three others of the Committee on Banking and Currency have been making to have a real rural-credits bill reported to the House. The Moss bill will not be satisfactory. You have a clear idea of what the farmer really needs and we appreciate your efforts in his behalf.

Sincerely, yours,

C. S. BARRETT.

I have been much gratified, Mr. Chairman, by the indorsements of my work in Congress which I have received from farm organizations all over the country. Mr. Chairman, the organized farmers in other States than mine have in their State conventions adopted resolutions expressing their appreciation of my efforts in behalf of the American farmer during the short time that I have been in Congress; and while these expressions from other States are sincerely gratifying to me, that which I prize most of all is the many expressions of appreciation and confidence and support which the organized farmers of my own State and of my own district have seen fit to give me. The farmers of my district are intelligent, and I know they appreciate the earnest efforts that I have made in their behalf. My enemies may sneer at me and characterize my efforts in behalf of rural credits as all bunco, but I shall not be deterred, and shall continue to fight for a real, direct, Government-aid rural-credits bill that will provide the American farmer with funds at a low rate of interest on terms that he can stand and under which he can prosper. The platform of the Democratic Party has pledged this relief to the American farmer; the President of the United States has pledged his support, and I firmly believe that before this Congress adjourns the pledge will be redeemed. The American farmer does not ask for charity, but he asks for simple justice; he does not ask for special privileges, but he asks for equality of treatment. As I have once before said on this floor, I do not think that the requirements for national defense are limited to battleships and standing armies alone. I am not half as much afraid of the foe from without, with whose threatened and imaginary invasion certain gentlemen try to persuade us into spending millions of dollars for our military establishments; but I do, as one who loves his country and gives some thought to its continued prosperity and safety, have fears of the canker and demoralization that always arise from economic distress and industrial injustice. No one honors more than I do the men who have fought our battles upon the land and upon the sea; no one has a greater pride in the military achievements of the American soldier and sailor, to whom we affectionately refer as the "men behind the guns," but there are others of whom I think and for whose welfare I plead and in whose welfare and prosperity are wrapped the safety and security of this Republic, and they are not the "men behind the guns" but are the "men behind the plows" and the "men in the overalls."

Mr. RUBEY. I appreciate the persistent efforts of the gentleman from Arkansas for a real rural-credits bill and not a makeshift, and I am in sympathy with his efforts. I would like to ask him when he thinks we will take up this matter for the purpose of agreeing on a bill in the House?

Mr. WINGO. The joint committee bill has been referred to a subcommittee to rewrite, and I understand now that we will take up the full subject in the House about the second week in April, and I hope that out of the consideration of the subject the House will pass a real, direct, Government-aid bill that will meet the views, demands, and necessities of the organized farmers.

Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to make all reasonable preparations for the national defense, but I am not willing to turn this Nation into an armed camp. I am not willing to vote for compulsory military service, which means conscription in the time of peace and which will take every young man of this country away from his home and school during some of the best years of his life, and confine him in a military barracks as part of a great standing army. While I am willing to make all necessary preparations for national defense, yet I insist that in making these preparations we should include the building up of the economic strength of the country by providing a direct Government aid rural-credit system for the farmers; by Federal aid in the building and maintaining of levees along the great rivers of the country, such as the Red and Arkansas Rivers, and the improvement of these great rivers in a legitimate way, so as to bear to market the local products at the lowest possible rate; and by the enactment of such laws as will improve the conditions of those who toil, and save them from some of the burdens that now bear heavily upon their shoulders. I am glad that this House only recently passed a bill authorizing the expenditure of $25,000,000 a year by the Federal Government in the building of rural roads, and am proud that I had a part in the passage of such a bill, and hope that the same will pass the Senate soon. I am glad that we have also succeeded in having recently established a separate Committee on Flood Control, and I hope we shall be able to get reported from this committee bills that will not only authorize the Federal Government to aid in the building and maintenance of levees on the Mississippi River, but on the Arkansas, Red, and other similar rivers. Another matter of great importance is a Federal marketing system, and I am glad that the proper committee of this House is about to prepare legislation which will provide a Federal marketing system that will be of great benefit to the farmers and fruit producers. But now I insist that we speedily enact a direct Government aid rural-credit system, by which the farmers can procure their funds at a low rate of interest under conditions and upon terms that will not be burdensome, so that not only may the farmers' burden be lightened, but that the agricultural development of the great South and West may be stimulated, and thereby build up the economic strength of our Nation.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the best way to guarantee the safety and security of this Republic is to foster and insure the prosperity and happiness of the farmers and those who toil, and see that they are permitted to enjoy the fruits of their labor to the fullest extent.

Is it not true, Mr. Chairman, that if war should come battleships and standing armies alone would not constitute our surest defense, but our real defense would be the farmer and his fellow toiler, whom the history of this and every other country shows always bear the brunt and burden of war. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RUBEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 11078. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 10037. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11628. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Lowell, county of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, to construct a bridge across the Merrimack River;

H. R. 10032. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River from a point on its banks in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., at or near the locality known as Woods Run, to a point on the opposite shore of said river within the borough of McKees Rocks, Pa.; and

H. R. 10487. An act reserving or excepting all ores or minerals on the lands, with the right of mining the same, on the site of the proposed post-office building at Calumet, Mich.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 17. An act permitting H. L. Corbin to purchase certain public lands;

S. 19. An act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce;

S. 31. An act for the relief of John L. Sevy;

S. 32. An act for the relief of William G. Williams, sr.;

S. 33. An act for the relief of Daniel M. Frost;

S. 3984. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4399. An act granting pension and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 40. An act to authorize agricultural entries on surplus coal lands in Indian reservations;

S. 43. An act in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation in the State of Utah containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes;

S. 137. An act for the relief of Omer D. Lewis;

S. 136. An act for the relief of Eva M. Bowman;

S. 67. An act for the relief of Mathilda P. Hansen;

S. 54. An act to provide for the refunding of certain moneys illegally assessed and collected in the district of Utah;

S. 142. An act for the relief of Mrs. George A. Miller;

S. 540. An act for the relief of Fred B. Balano;

S. 53. An act for the relief of the Eldredge Bros.' Live Stock Co., a corporation;

S. 35. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Myton, Utah;

S. 138. An act for the relief of the Ottawa Indian Tribe of Blanchards Fork and Roche de Bœuf;

S. 140. An act for the relief of the estate of Israel Folsom; and

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the joint commission of Congress to investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], who is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, I think, took great pleasure in presenting the opinion of Judge Sessions, reading a couple of extracts from that opinion of the judge for the benefit of the House; but there is another little paragraph here in the opinion that he did not read. His eulogy of this inspection department and this judge was real nice. I desire to bring this paragraph—it is a gem—to the attention of the committee, and particularly to my friend who is a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. This is another thing which the judge said:

> The undisputed evidence shows, and it is conceded, that at the time of accident the steamer Eastland was securely tied to a dock in Chicago River at least one-half mile from Lake Michigan. Therefore it appears conclusively that the crime charged against these defendants in this indictment was not committed "upon the high seas" or "out of the jurisdiction of any particular State." On the contrary, the place where the vessel overturned is within the body of Cook County and within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois. It is equally certain that the crime charged was not committed upon a vessel then on a voyage upon Lake Michigan or "any of the waters connecting" the Great Lakes. By no fiction of law or fact can Chicago River be regarded as Lake Michigan or one of the high seas. Under present laws a crime local to that river is cognizable by the courts of the State of Illinois and not by the courts of the United States. (U. S. v. Rogers, 47 Fed. Rep., 1.)

Now, we are appropriating money, and have been for years, to keep the Chicago River, a navigable river of the United States, in an improved condition for navigation, and this judge renders an opinion that that river is not navigable waters of the United States; that we have not jurisdiction over that river. "The place where the vessel overturned is within the body of Cook County and within the jurisdiction of the State of Illinois." Then why are we appropriating money annually to keep that river in a navigable condition? The inspection department, not alone in Chicago but in every great port, should pay more attention to the people who ought to be protected not only around the harbors but everywhere they have jurisdiction. Why, gentlemen, do you realize that upon the Great Lakes and at many of the harbors excursion boats are crowded, the same as this one was crowded, far beyond their capacity, and that is the reason this boat overturned in the Chicago River?

That is all I care to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the matter before the committee just now is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to strike out the paragraph which provides the salaries for the Federal Steamboat-Inspection Service in the city of Washington. I could not support that sort of amendment, even if it were intended as a rebuke for the incident of the sinking of the Eastland in the river at Chicago. If we were to abolish departments and bureaus because of some incident or accident occurring in the jurisdiction of the bureau or department, we might just as readily abolish the present national administration, because to a certain extent with respect to revenues it has been a failure. I have no objection to the gentleman from Chicago expressing his views upon this horrible tragedy and giving vent to what he thinks the inspectors ought to have done, although I question very much whether the passage of 100 laws or the creating of new bureaus in any department would prevent the recurrence of some such great calamity at one time or another.

Unhappily these things come despite any law that human ingenuity can devise.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania comes from a section of our country that should make him fairly familiar with steamboats and boats and vessels, and therefore I am going to ask him a question, and that is whether in his judgment there was any negligence on the part of anyone if a boat is tied up to a dock and before they complete loading her with freight she turns over and nearly a thousand people perish? Does the gentleman believe that some one was guilty, or was it simply a matter of course and of daily occurrence?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I think it is perfectly fair for the gentleman to make his speech and to express his views with regard to the administration of the department which his party at this particular time happens to control.

Mr. SABATH. No; will the gentleman yield for a question? I have asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to get through with my statement. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman if my time were not limited.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not attempt to settle this Eastland disaster. The matter has been the subject of investigation by the department and by the courts, and I shall not attempt to determine whether it was the result of negligence or not. How could I determine that question? The gentleman is unable to determine it himself.

Mr. SABATH. I have determined it long ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this, that great power is given by the lawmaking body to the inspectors of the Steamboat-Inspection Service. It is a power that is generally exercised all over this land, and, so far as I know, generally exercised with credit to the bureau and to the men who undertake to serve it. It is so remarkable in contrast with our failure to exercise a governmental power over things international that I feel obliged to use it by way of illustration in order to "point a moral," if not "to adorn a tale." A few days ago there was tremendous excitement in this House because, perchance, the Government of the United States, representing 100,000,000 of people, seemed to have no "right," because of musty international law, to advise an American citizen who wanted to put himself in a position of danger under a foreign flag, not under the American flag, bear in mind, that he ought not to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that he be allowed to use that five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, an individual citizen, whom we should protect under the American flag always, and for whom we would fight if called upon by the President of the United States in the regular way, seems to have the "right," according to this hazy international tradition, to sail under a foreign flag in a war zone and by reason of his "right" risk the safety and peace of the entire Nation. We exercise no control over him. According to our recent vote, he can go if he wants to go, but——

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to inform the gentleman that these lives were lost not under a foreign flag but under the American flag.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They ought to have been protected under the American flag no matter whether they were lost in Chicago or in Mexico.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I am trying to bring about.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was trying to protect them the other day under a foreign flag under pretense that they were under the American flag.

Mr. SABATH. No. That is not the contention.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman contended that he had the right to involve his country in war if he should attempt to travel under a foreign flag, and not under his own flag—the latter a right that I would stand for as long as I had a drop of blood left in my body. But I was observing that while apparently we have no right to control an American citizen who pokes his nose into other people's business under a foreign flag, in a foreign-war zone, we have a remarkably strong right to prevent citizens of the United States, in their own territory, on their own soil, from doing everything they please.

Let us see. We are told, as a consequence of this Eastland disaster, that the committee has recommended the appointment of new inspectors, and we are going to have an improved inspection service—to do what? To tell the owner of a steamboat, who thinks he has a "right" to go out on his own steamboat where he pleases, that unless he comes up to certain conditions he can not go. Here we exercise considerable of a "right" in regard to an American on his own soil, under the American flag; but when it comes to the exercise of that right as he seeks to involve us, under a foreign flag, in the risks of war, it is another matter. We seem to have lost control.

If an American citizen undertakes to leave a port in the inland waters of the United States and sail away a hundred miles, the Steamboat-Inspection Service sends a man on board his vessel and says to him, "How many men have you on board here?" The man answers, "One hundred and one men." The inspector says, "You are not licensed to carry more than 100 men, and one of you must come off." So that American citizen who thinks he has the "right" to go on his own ship under his own flag can get off and walk! Yet when that same American citizen goes on a foreign ship, under a foreign flag, loaded with powder to fight another foreign ship of a country with whom we are at peace, we say, "We have no right to warn you off." We cringe in a cowardly manner, and instead of taking our troublesome brother by the back of the neck and throwing him off, we say, "We will go to war; we will involve our whole country in distress and mourning, in order to protect your international 'right' to do as you please." [Applause.]

Oh, yes; when there is a fire down the street and the police come rushing in and throw a rope around a certain area and tell the citizens generally that they shall not pass through, because there is danger, a wall may fall and crush them, some reckless person bobs up and says, "I have a right to go under that rope, and I am going;" but the American policeman, what does he do? Is he embarrassed by international law? No; he grabs that fellow by the back of the neck and yanks him out, and if needs be, puts him in the station house where he has a fine opportunity to think the matter over. We exercise a wise control over our own citizens in our own land, and especially when they threaten the public peace. We exercise that control when they go upon American ships in American waters, but when they step aboard a foreign vessel under a foreign flag and exercise their so-called "right" to involve our peaceful country in the war of Europe, we have no power to interfere. We must behave at home but do as we please abroad. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Inspectors of hulls and inspectors of boilers, as authorized by acts approved April 9, 1906, May 28, 1908, and March 4, 1913, $171,100.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. What is the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], to strike out the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion by Mr. SABATH: Strike out the paragraph, page 126, beginning with line 6 and ending with line 9.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman can not be serious about that.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to be heard, Mr. Chairman. I make this motion for the purpose of propounding an inquiry of the chairman of the committee as to the rights and jurisdiction and powers of these inspectors. I was present at the hearings in the city of Chicago a few days after the Eastland disaster and I was unable to ascertain what powers or rights these inspectors have, unless it be to inspect a boiler or a hull. They do not seem to have the jurisdiction or the power to say whether a boat is seaworthy or not.

It was a matter of common knowledge, known to all the people connected with steamships in the United States, that this boat, the Eastland, was a cranky boat; that it was unseaworthy; and that it was hard to handle. That fact was known to Reid and Eckliff, the two inspectors. Nevertheless, the evidence shows that they deliberately sanctioned the use of that boat, and empowered a captain, who possessed no previous experience or knowledge or even common sense, to command it. They granted him the power and made him master of this boat, which everyone recognized was hard to handle and most difficult to manage.

Not only that, but, further, the evidence disclosed that they had knowledge of the fact that the engineer was not a man of any experience. In lieu of this, and due to the influence of the steamship company, they issued a permit to this incompetent engineer, who, in connection with the captain, through gross and wanton negligence, were responsible for this terrific loss of life. The evidence disclosed the fact that this engineer was a relative of one of these inspectors, but nowhere, in the opinion of the court, do I see that fact mentioned.

The chairman of the committee, in defending the department, states that the people of Chicago were unduly excited and suffered from hysteria. I want to assure the gentleman, as well as the Secretary of Commerce, that the people of Chicago had a perfect right to become excited, but they did not suffer with hysteria. I realize and recognize that the Secretary meant well, and I do not desire to criticize his action, because I really believe that he meant to investigate; but as my colleague from the city of Chicago [Mr. MADDEN] has stated, he was unfortunate in the way he started. He commenced with the assumption that everyone under his supervision was innocent of any wrongdoing; that they were all capable men, notwithstanding the fact that he had no knowledge of their ability or their experience, due to the short space of time that he had this department under his jurisdiction, being that they were in the service before he was ever made the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I dislike very much to accuse any man. This is the first time in my nine years of service in this House that I have taken the floor to criticize the action of anyone in our departments, or anyone connected with the departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman takes rather a peculiar position. Because of this unfortunate accident at Chicago, resulting in the loss of this steamship and many hundreds of lives, and because the gentleman seems to be under the impression that the local inspectors failed to do something that they ought to have done in connection with that vessel——

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I charge that they have done that which they had no right to do.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because of that fact then, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman wants to cut out the whole appropriation, and deprive the whole country of any inspection whatever for the preservation of lives upon steamships upon the lakes and rivers of this country. I am sure he need not——

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have stated that I made that motion for the purpose of securing information from the chairman, who has no doubt devoted a great deal of time ascertaining the duties of these men, for whom we are appropriating this large sum of money. That was the reason I made the motion.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was under the impression, from the great earnestness with which the gentleman spoke, that he was really in favor of the motion he had made.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize anyone to ask a question unless some Member has the floor. The time of the gentleman [Mr. SABATH] has expired.

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more to give my colleague the opportunity to ask me a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, we have spent more than an hour upon this one proposition.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Are not 800 lives worth spending some time about?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I submit that this discussion of the Eastland disaster is not adding anything to the general information of the country. Much as we all deplore that accident, I hope gentlemen will permit us to go along with this bill and really accomplish something during the short time that remains between now and the time of adjournment.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman realizes that I am not an obstructionist.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to continue to address the committee for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I want to ask my colleague a question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] said this accident occurred while that department was under our party. Was that the statement he made?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So long as the gentleman raises that question, that is exactly what I said, but it was drawn out by the tenor of the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois. He invited the criticism. Of course it might have happened under any administration. That kind of an accident is just as likely to happen under a Prohibition administration as under a Democratic administration.

Mr. GALLAGHER. The reason I wanted to raise the question was that the chief inspector, as I understand it, has been in that position for upward of 12 years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made no direct reflection on the Democratic Party, although I am capable of doing it, I will state to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Well, it would not be the first time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I would do it again if conditions warranted, and hope they may before the day is over. [Laughter.]

Mr. SABATH. I realize that the gentleman is capable of criticizing, and is capable of charging the Democratic Party with everything that the Republican Party is guilty of. [Laughter.] Now, inasmuch as my colleague has asked a question, I wish to state that, as I understand, the chief inspector and all these other inspectors came into the service long before the Democratic Party was in power, and they are mostly political appointees. What I would like to have is men of ability, of experience, men who understand their duties, to be appointed to such important positions. I know if they were appointed under a careful examination, upon merit, a thing like the Eastland disaster could not repeat itself.

Mr. KONOP. Does not the gentleman think he can find good Democrats to hold these positions?

Mr. SABATH. There is no question about that, in the gentleman's district as well as in mine and in any and every district in the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think my colleague is correct when he says these officials were appointed through political influence. I do not think they were appointed through political influence under a Republican administration or retained through political influence under a Democratic administration. I do not believe that political influence has been considered at all in the Steamboat-Inspection Service for many years. Whoever the men may be, whatever their politics may be, I am very sure that they were appointed under the merit system and without regard to political influence.

Now, my colleague [Mr. SABATH] proposes to strike out of this bill an item which provides for the inspectors of hulls and the inspectors of boilers. I had the honor in this House to have charge of the bill creating the provision for the inspection of locomotive boilers, which was based upon the law in reference to the inspection of steamboat boilers. To me it is a monstrous proposition that anyone in this day and age should propose to do away with the inspection by the Government of either steamboat or locomotive boilers.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not yield yet. The locomotive-boiler inspection act has been of great value in the saving of lives of passengers and railway employees in the country. Ask any railroad employees—and they are especially and vitally interested—whether they would favor doing away with locomotive-boiler inspection because perchance some locomotive boiler had blown up.

Now, certainly no one would say that we ought to do away with all inspection service as to steamboat boilers or steamboats themselves because an accident, bad as it was, had happened. That is a good reason for giving better inspection service, but is not a sufficient reason for throwing the thing wide open and doing without any inspection service at all. While my colleague, a while ago, suggested that he would like to see it transferred to the Navy Department, the result of his amendment would be that after the 1st of July there would be no inspection service under existing law, and there would be no law authorizing any inspection service in the Navy Department.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my colleague that I have made my statement clear when I stated that I made my motion for the purpose of receiving certain information and that I would not insist upon it.

Mr. MANN. I waited until the Chair was about to put the question to the House, thinking perchance my colleague would ask leave to withdraw his motion, but he did not; he was asking that the committee vote on it. If I have persuaded him to withdraw it, I am to be congratulated.

Mr. SABATH. I did not hear the Chairman put the vote or know that he was about to put the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks leave to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assistant inspectors, as authorized by act of April 9, 1906, for the following ports: New York, 30 at $2,000 each; New Orleans, 6 at $1,800 each; Baltimore, 8 at $1,800 each; Providence, 4 at $1,800 each; Boston, 6 at $1,800 each; Philadelphia, 8 at $1,800 each; San Francisco, 10 at $1,800 each; Buffalo, 6 at $1,600 each; Cleveland, 6 at $1,600 each; Milwaukee, 2 at $1,600 each; Chicago, 4 at $1,600 each (including 2 transferred from Milwaukee); Grand Haven, 4 at $1,600 each (including 2 transferred from Milwaukee); Detroit, 4 at $1,600 each (including 2 transferred from Milwaukee); Norfolk, 6 at $1,600 each; Seattle, 8 at $1,600 each; Portland (Oreg.), 2 at $1,600 each; Albany (N. Y.), 2 at $1,600 each; 2 traveling inspectors at $2,500 each; $211,000.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. I want to ask the gentleman why is it that in the paragraph providing for inspectors at Providence the salary is fixed at $1,800, while at Chicago it is $1,600?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not answer the gentleman except to say that that is the schedule of salaries submitted to the committee by the department.

Mr. SANFORD. The law fixes them at $1,800, those named at $1,800, except Providence. If there is a good reason for giving those at Providence $1,800, I have no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. All I know about it is that is the recommendation by the department.

Mr. SANFORD. Would it be customary or usual for the department to make a recommendation different from what the law is?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As a matter of fact, none of the 30 men here are authorized by law.

Mr. SANFORD. The salary of $1,800 is fixed for these cities named by law except Providence, and I can see no reason for discrimination between Providence, Chicago, and Albany.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that the inspectors on the inland waters receive $1,600 and on ocean ports $1,800, although there are some exceptions to that.

Mr. SANFORD. That does not seem to be any explanation.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from New York will pardon me, I think I can explain that. The salary of the inspectors is fixed by the amount of territory and amount of work that they are called upon to cover. I have been on the committee for the last 17 years, and I know that is the reason for fixing the salary. As I remember the vessels they are called upon to inspect, the number of them is to some extent the basis on which the salary is fixed. The number of vessels inspected in Chicago is less than it is in some other places on the ocean front.

Mr. SANFORD. That might be the basis of the law which provides salaries at certain places of $1,600.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I think those salaries are based on the number of vessels to be inspected.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. It is neither the number of vessels inspected or the number of vessels owned; the salary is fixed by law, but it has nothing to do with the number of vessels they inspect or the territory covered. I think probably the $1,800 or $2,000 salary along the Atlantic coast and San Francisco was on the basis that they had larger and more complicated vessels to inspect. As to Providence, I think it is comparable to Boston and other places on the coast.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It covers a larger extent of territory than it formerly did.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that I think all the places are provided with inspection service now, although I do not know, but I take it that Providence has an inspection service now, probably by transfer from another port, where these inspectors are probably getting $1,800, as they would be authorized to get under the bill which we passed in the House the other day, whenever it becomes a law.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from New York will permit, under the provisions of the bill that passed the House the other day the inspectors at Providence would receive $1,600, and I think the gentleman is correct, in substance, in saying that the reason why the department recommended a salary of $1,800 for those at Providence was that they have been detailed from Boston, no provision having been made in existing law for inspection at the port of Providence.

In the bill that we passed the other day the phraseology is changed so far as Boston is concerned to limit the inspectors to the port of Boston, whereas, under the existing law, the phraseology is the "district of Boston," and Providence at the present time I assume is included in the district of Boston.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. These salaries are not fixed according to the size of the vessels or the number of vessels inspected, so far as the Pacific coast is concerned. They were fixed out there a good many years ago when San Francisco was a great shipping port and Seattle and Puget Sound had a small amount of business. It is unjust and unfair, but we have never been able to change it. There have been more vessels inspected at Seattle for the last five years than at San Francisco, and during the last year the Puget Sound district was second to New York in number of vessels, and yet we are in the $1,600 class.

Mr. MANN. How do they compare out there with Buffalo, N. Y.?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not know. I am not complaining of San Francisco getting $1,800, although they have fewer vessels inspected there than at Seattle.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say with respect to this subject that the location of the inspector hardly seems a proper criterion on which to fix his pay, as was shown in the case of the Eastland. It should be rather the quality of the inspection that counts.

The basis fixed in this paragraph does not seem to me to be fair. The quality of work required of all these men is the same. Whether it is inland work or lake work or upon the ocean should make no difference. I do not wish to make this point of order, but it does seem to me that the committee ought to consent to an amendment here fixing the basis of pay for all these inspectors, all being of the same grade and same quality of work, at $1,800. Would the committee tell me whether they would consent to to such an amendment?

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is true that men do the same amount of work. On page 916 of the hearings it will be seen that inspectors at Providence worked on an average 244 hours overtime. There may be conditions of that kind that would warrant this extra pay, and I think before the gentleman from New York makes the point of order the full facts in the case ought to be made known. I believe there is some sufficient reason for this.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to yield the point of order if the facts were known, but I have been unable to find anyone who can give me any reason that appeals to my mind why the pay should be more in one place than it is in another place.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit——

Mr. SANFORD. I will submit; but I would like to have the chairman of the committee tell me whether he will consent to an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman heard the explanation that I made as to the reason why the assistant inspectors at Providence were receiving the pay of $1,600. It is not the purpose to reduce the salary of any of these assistant inspectors that are now in the service. In the bill that was under consideration in the House on Monday the salaries of these various officials were placed at $1,800 and all others at $1,600. It was not desired to reduce the salary of the present inspector detailed from Boston to the port of Providence. If we adopted the amendment suggested by the gentleman it would reduce their salary, and that, I think, is a potent reason why the gentleman should not press his point of order. The bill that passed the House changed the phraseology so that instead of providing for the district of Boston it merely provided for assistant inspectors at the port of Boston, and then gave authorization to the Steamboat-Inspection Service to appoint assistant inspectors wherever they saw fit at these other salaries.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, first I desire to make it clear that I do not know any of the people interested in this matter. I do not know any of the inspectors at Albany, and so this matter does not present a personal aspect to me. The Board of Army Engineers, for instance, has recently determined that the Hudson River, which passes through my district, is destined in the near future to carry the most important river traffic of any river in the United States, and they have also recently determined in a very formal way that the steamboats that ply on our river are the most modern, the best equipped, and the largest in the world. Having those two facts in my mind, I do not want to do anything here by waiving my rights that would depreciate the importance of the port that is in my district. I very much doubt if the port of Albany in a few years from now will be inferior to the port of Providence in importance, if it now is, and in reference to the commerce of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore offer the amendment that wherever the figures "$1,600" appear in and after line 16 those figures be changed to "$1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his point of order and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 126, amend by striking out the figures "$1,600" wherever they appear in line 16 and the following lines and insert "$1,800."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. If the point of order is good as to the increase in this compensation, the point of order is good as to the establishment of the places.

Mr. RUCKER. But that has been waived.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York reserved the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York withdrew the point of order and offered his amendment. It is too late to renew the point of order. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York includes those already authorized, as well as the increase authorized under this bill, and their salaries are fixed by law.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will reserve the point of order for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I reserve it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think possibly I can persuade the gentleman not to make it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I do not think the gentleman can.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, every man who acts as steamboat inspector must have special qualifications for that work. He must be a mechanic; he must be a shipbuilder; he must understand everything connected with the construction and operation of a boat. He is not merely appointed because somebody wants to give him a job, and there is no man in any service who attends so strictly to the work coming under their jurisdiction as those men do. I have had some experience as the owner of steamboats in watching those men make inspections. I have remained up all night for many a night on over one hundred occasions while these inspections were being made and assisted the inspectors by furnishing them information in connection with their work. Now, for example, the boiler inspector who examines the boiler must be a boiler maker; he must be an engineer; he is required to go through the boiler, through the fire box, crawl around in every part of the interior of the boiler, just like a chimney sweep would be required to go through a chimney; he is required to examine the crown sheets, the flues, the fire box, and everything connected with the boiler and with the operation of the engine. He must know scientifically what this boiler and engine is enabled to do under certain circumstances. He not only goes through and makes personal inspection but he takes a hammer and chisel and pounds every place throughout the machinery and boiler to ascertain whether there are any soft spots anywhere. He makes a cold-water pressure test of the boiler capacity to show how much cold-water pressure it will stand, and the cold-water pressure is much more rigid against weak spots in a boiler than the steam pressure is, and as the result of the cold-water test he is then able to ascertain and fix the number of pounds of steam pressure which the boiler will be able to carry safely. He fixes the gauge; he locks it at the pressure which the boiler is allowed to carry and beyond which it will not go.

Then, in company with the hull inspector, he goes around through the hull to find if there are any weak spots in the hull; whether the ship is qualified to go to sea. He looks over the life-saving equipment on the boat to see that it is properly supplied. The boiler and the hull inspectors on the boats are required to examine the engineers and the captain of the boats, and upon the examination made by those men certificates are issued for a man to act as captain and engineer, and no man in the United States can run a steamboat on Government waters except upon a certificate issued by the boiler and steamboat inspectors.

So I say that the men who perform this work are performing a high type of work, requiring experience that can not be obtained without great study and labor of several years of experience, and $1,600 a year is not a sufficient compensation for this class of work; and these men, if they are entitled to $1,800 in any one port in the United States, they are entitled to it in every port of the United States. It is not a question of the size of the ship, for the size of the ship makes no difference. The machinery of a ship in a small ship is the same as the machinery in a large ship, and the inspection of one is as important as the inspection of the other; and these men are very attentive to their duties and are entitled to the compensation allowed them for the port of New York and the port of Boston and other seaports—in every port in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. In the last legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill the salary of some of these inspectors included in the amendment was fixed at $1,600. Section 6 of the current legislative act contains this provision:

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws to the extent they are inconsistent with rates of salaries or compensation appropriated by this act are repealed, and the rates of salaries or compensation of officers or employees herein appropriated shall constitute the rate of salary or compensation of such officers or employees, respectively, until otherwise fixed by annual rate of appropriation or other law.

The amendment changes existing law which is now in the appropriation bill, and the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I would like to ask if the recommendations of Gen. Uhler in regard to the increase of the inspection service on the Great Lakes are embodied in the bill as it now reads; and, if not, to what extent those recommendations have been carried out?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are. The committee allowed the estimates for assistant inspectors just as submitted. The only difference in the estimates submitted and this bill is that the committee did not allow one additional supervising inspector, but all the assistant inspectors and traveling inspectors were allowed just as they were submitted in the estimates.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Is that true also in regard to additional clerks in the office of the Inspection Service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No. The committee recommended the same appropriation for the next fiscal year as was allowed for the current year.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 126, line 24, after the figures "$211,000," insert:
"Provided, That no part of this sum of $211,000 shall be used to pay the salaries of either of the inspectors who in 1915 were commissioned to inspect the steamboat Eastland."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the provision here was subject to a point of order, due to the fact that we create, if I am not mistaken, about 30 new inspectors.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Thirty-six.

Mr. SABATH. Thirty-six. I did not wish to make that point of order, and did not make it, because I do believe we need more inspectors, but the right kind of inspectors, men who will perform their duty, men who are competent and faithful.

My amendment provides that no part of this appropriation should be paid to these two inspectors whom I have charged with negligence, and who, in my judgment, are in a great measure guilty and responsible for the Eastland disaster.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Were these two men to whom the gentleman refers inspectors or assistant inspectors?

Mr. SABATH. They were inspectors.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Then, I want to submit to the gentleman that his amendment to this paragraph is hardly germane, although no point of order is made against it. The paragraph appropriates for assistant inspectors instead of inspectors.

Mr. SABATH. I think they are assistant inspectors. They are in charge of small stations.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What was done with these assistant inspectors?

Mr. SABATH. They have been reinstated. I have protested against their reinstatement, but I have been informed by the Secretary of Commerce that they have already been reinstated, and that he can not do otherwise.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Were they reinstated at the order of the Secretary of Commerce?

Mr. SABATH. I presume he is the one who has the power to reinstate. They were suspended pending the investigation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They could not have been reinstated if he had objected. If the Secretary should have so desired, he could have prevented them from being reinstated, could he not?

Mr. SABATH. I presume so. I honestly believe that we can find a great many men who are capable of performing these duties. These two men are not, as I stated before, and as I stated in the letter which I have placed in the RECORD and which I mailed to the Secretary of Commerce. These men ought not to be permitted to remain for a single day in the service, and surely are not entitled to be reinstated. Therefore I hope that my amendment will prevail.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is offered to a paragraph which provides for the payment of assistant inspectors. I do not know exactly who these officials are at whom the gentleman aims, but they are referred to in the decision of the United States court which has been referred to as local inspectors. They are referred to also by the Secretary of Commerce as local inspectors.

But whether they are inspectors or assistant inspectors, I wish to submit that, of course, the Congress can not undertake to try these men. They have been reinstated by the Secretary of Commerce. He suspended them promptly, and not until they were fully exonerated by the decision of the United States judge, in an opinion which has been placed in the RECORD, did the Secretary of Commerce undertake to restore them to full duty and pay.

I submit that, of course, this House should not undertake to enter into any settlement or adjudication of the question as to whether those inspectors are entitled to be continued on the roll or not. The Secretary of Commerce is fully capable of settling that proposition, and for one I believe that the Secretary of Commerce acted with his usual sound judgment and settled it as it should have been settled. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerk hire, service at large: For compensation, not exceeding $1,500 a year to each person, of clerks to boards of steamboat inspectors, to be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce in accordance with the provisions of section 4414, Revised Statutes, and the acts of April 9, 1906, and March 4, 1911, $84,000.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "$84,000," in line 7, and insert "$98,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 127, line 7, by striking out "$84,000" and inserting "$98,000."

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the testimony given by Secretary Redfield to the committee this statement was made in behalf of the Department of Commerce:

The appropriation for clerk hire, Steamboat-Inspection Service, for the fiscal year 1916 is $84,000. The bureau wishes to add to its clerical force in the field 10 clerks at $900 per annum each. It also wishes to promote certain efficient clerks in the field service, and an additional $5,000 has been asked for this purpose, which will make a total increase of $14,000, or a total appropriation for this purpose of $98,000 for the fiscal year 1916.

Now, if it is true that the work of the Inspection Service has so enormously increased in the inspection itself, the work in the offices—that is, the clerical work—must have increased in proportion; and inasmuch as the committee has seen fit to accept the recommendations of the department in regard to the Inspection Service, I think it would naturally follow that the committee should also accept the recommendations in regard to clerk hire.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the committee has recommended an increase of $63,000 for employees in this particular bureau, and $20,000 increase for contingent and traveling expenses. We have allowed every assistant inspector asked for by the Secretary of Commerce and the Supervising Inspector General. These particular services are clerical, and the committee felt that in view of the large increase for the actual field work of the bureau, it was unnecessary to allow an extra appropriation for services purely clerical.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there any charge placed upon the steamboat owner to reimburse any amount of this money that is paid as salaries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is not.

Mr. FESS. It is purely a gratuity on the part of the Government to maintain a safe service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is.

Mr. STAFFORD. It must be said, of course, that there are some tonnage dues.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is no direct reimbursement of the expense of this service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARRISON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1159. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to grant the use of the Coos Head Military Reservation, in the State of Oregon, to the cities of Marshfield and North Bend, Oreg., both being municipal corporations, for park purposes;

S. 1099. An act to authorize the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. to change its line of railroad through the Chilocco Indian Reservation, State of Oklahoma;

S. 1086. An act authorizing Ponca City, Okla., and the board of education of said city to convey certain lands;

S. 1068. An act relating to desert-land entries;

S. 1067. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to the city of Bozeman, Mont., certain land for alley purposes;

S. 1064. An act to provide for the nonmineral entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing coal, phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals in Alaska;

S. 927. An act for the relief of Clarence Hazelbaker;

S. 888. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to confer upon Marcus A. Jordan the life-saving medal of the first class;

S. 797. An act for the relief of John E. Woods;

S. 741. An act for the relief of John H. Armstrong;

S. 710. An act to authorize national banking associations to avail themselves of State laws providing for the guaranteeing of deposits;

S. 649. An act making appropriation for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington;

S. 592. An act to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes;

S. 585. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Sioux Indians against the United States;

S. 1782. An act for the relief of Joseph Gorman;

S. 1728. An act to amend section 1 of an act approved March 3, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 751), entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions on alienation of lands of allottees of the Quapaw Agency, Okla., and the sale of all tribal lands, school, agency, or other lands on any of the reservations within the jurisdiction of such agency, and for other purposes";

S. 1460. An act to reinstate Frederick J. Birkett as third lieutenant in the United States Coast Guard;

S. 1425. An act for the relief of D. M. Carman, representing the estate of Luis R. Yangco, deceased;

S. 1416. An act to amend section 4215 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes;

S. 1388. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to furnish hot water from the hot springs, on the Hot Springs Reservation, for drinking and bathing purposes free of cost to the Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital Association;

S. 1372. An act for the relief of the heir or heirs of John Howard Payne;

S. 1326. An act for the relief of Vilhelm Torkildsen;

S. 1259. An act to restore to the active list First Lieut. of Engineers Henry O. Slayton, retired, United States Coast Guard;

S. 1225. An act to amend section 4433 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to working steam pressure allowable on boilers in steam vessels, and section 4418 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to hydrostatic test of steam boilers;

S. 2291. An act to make October 12 of each and every year a public holiday in the District of Columbia, to be known as Columbus day;

S. 2290. An act authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Elsie McCaulley from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Philadelphia, Pa.;

S. 1878. An act making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, and under the provisions of section 151 of the act approved March 3, 1911, commonly known as the Judicial Code;

S. 1859. An act to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of New Mexico;

S. 1843. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex.;

S. 1818. An act for the relief of Nelson T. Saunders; and

S. 1810. An act for the relief of Johannes T. Jensen.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation of materials used in the construction of rails, wheels, axles, and other railway equipment, and the cause of their failure, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $15,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The other day the House was in such a state of wisdom that it passed a bill which I had introduced, reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, authorizing scientific and other research and investigation in the Department of Commerce.

My very warm friend from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD, was inclined to think it would have no value except as it might breed extravagance. We are now considering items in the Bureau of Standards, which is probably as able a scientific bureau as can be found anywhere in the world, unless it be in Germany, and nearly every item in this bill under that is subject to a point of order. The point of order has not been made this time so far, and I hope will not be made; but if, fortunately, the bill which the House passed the other day becomes a law we can then make appropriations, whether made in the specific items or not I do not undertake to say, which will authorize the bureau to do the work that it is now doing, which is contemplated to be done under the provisions of this act.

A year or two ago the Bureau of Standards sent a man out to Chicago and another one to St. Louis, or perhaps the same one, and to various other cities, in connection with the settlement of questions arising in those cities involving electrolysis of gas and water pipes, supposed to be caused by the electric currents. These gentlemen effected a settlement which was acted upon by the cities, and which in Chicago, so I was informed, probably saved millions of dollars at practically no expense, and I think at no expense to the Government, although I am not certain about that. They are now investigating particularly the breakage of railway rails. Under the new processes for the manufacture of steel rails there have been a good many rails broken, which caused grave disasters. I have seen a number of these broken rails at different places where they were on exhibition, and I am informed by railroad men that the work being done by the bureau probably will be of immense value to the railroads, and particularly to the traveling public, and there are a good many lines where we can profitably and fairly have the Government conduct the scientific work, which can only be done by a scientific bureau and in a scientific manner if the results are to be good.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, on page 2 of the bill we make an appropriation to pay the salary of the financial clerk of the Senate. At the time the bill was reported and at the time we passed this item we were appropriating $1,250 additional while the office was held by the then present incumbent. The incumbent of that office is now dead, and I ask unanimous consent to return to that provision to offer an amendment striking out that amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] asks unanimous consent to recur to page 2 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa state his amendment?

Mr. GOOD. On page 2, line 16, I move to strike out the words—

And $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in lines 16 and 17, strike out the words "and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, while we are going back, I ask unanimous consent to recur to page 78 for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to recur to page 78 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 78, in line 6, strike out the words "three messengers" and insert the words "four messengers"; and in line 9, strike out the sum "$80,300" and insert the sum "$81,140."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is simply to correct an inadvertence of the committee. The Secretary's office has always had four messengers, and it recommended for one messenger an increase to $1,000, and it estimated for three other messengers. The committee did not see fit to allow the increase for the one messenger, and, by inadvertence, failed to appropriate for one messenger. This is to correct that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to line 11, on page 15, for the purpose of offering an amendment to insert an item for clerk to the Committee on Mines and Mining at $2,000 and a messenger at $720.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to recur to page 15 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. FOSTER. It is an amendment providing for the clerk to the Committee on Mines and Mining, at $2,000, and messenger, at $720.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I do not see it on page 15, line 11.

Mr. FOSTER. It is to be inserted there in its alphabetical place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Illinois asks unanimous consent to recur to page 15 to offer an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman wish it to read "messenger at $720" or "janitor at $720," which is the language carried elsewhere in this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Make it "janitor." I think that is the proper language.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this an oversight?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is not. The Committee on Mines and Mining have a session clerk, and we thought that the committee ought to have an annual clerk.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is new, then, only in that the gentleman asks for it for the first time, although there has been temporary work heretofore?

Mr. FOSTER. There has been a session clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 15, at the end of line 11, insert "Mines and Mining, clerk, $2,000, and janitor, $720."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To develop color standards and methods of color measurement, with special reference to their industrial use in standardization and specification of colorants such as dyestuffs, inks, and pigments, and other products, including cotton-seed oil, paint, paper, and textiles, in which color is a pertinent property, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $5,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the committee say whether this is a new item?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a new item.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is the reason for it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can best answer the gentleman by reading what the Director of the Bureau of Standards has to say on the subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the gentleman read it, for I think there is a necessity for something of the sort.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Dr. Stratton, Director of the Bureau of Standards, said:

Mr. BYRNS. Doctor, to develop color standards and methods of color measurement, you are asking an appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. STRATTON. The cottonseed oil industry, the butter industry, textile and paper industries, and many others are very urgently in need of color standards and methods of using them. We found it out in taking up several of these matters. For instance, Congress passed a law in regard to the coloring of butterine; in fact, several States passed laws saying manufactured butter should not be colored more than a given per cent. Now the moment that is done it assumes a method of measuring color by which you can tell what is 1 per cent or 2 per cent. They had a set of tinted glasses, which I mentioned before, but they are not efficient and not proper. Many of these industries base their sales upon color. Cottonseed oil, especially, is a very important case. And much of this work I have shown you here is in connection with work for that industry.

He states that they are doing a little of that work, but are not able to do it fast enough, and the committee therefore allowed this additional appropriation for the purpose of increasing his facilities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of an investigation and an appropriation to carry it on. There is a dearth of dyestuffs in the country now that has become alarming, so far as the textile industry is concerned, and there is little of encouragement as to expected cargoes from the State Department. It is high time that the Government took some cognizance of the dyestuff situation. Hearings have been had before the Committee on Ways and Means, which indicate the concern of the manufacturing world, particularly in the matter of garments, hats, and dress goods. These industries can not continue unless relief is afforded.

In this connection it ought to be said—and I think it is wise to put it in the RECORD—that while we are having a great many difficulties in the State Department with respect to purely diplomatic questions affecting one of the great nations, Germany, there is very little being said about our difficulties with another great nation which has impeded the progress of American imports and exports on the high seas. Cargo after cargo of American commerce has been held up by one of the belligerent powers, and certain cargoes containing dyestuffs, which are of great service to the people of this country, have also been held up. They go into the prize courts of Great Britain, and there the question remains in dispute. It seems as if the country should be informed as to whether there shall be any relief from a situation that has become well-nigh intolerable.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the dyestuff question in this country is very serious. We are making some dyestuffs, not of the highest quality, and even the dyestuffs which we are making are, unfortunately, not all of the best quality. I think that the Bureau of Standards, if it is given the opportunity, might be able to be of very great assistance to those who are endeavoring to make dyestuffs. A very well-known and celebrated individual made the remark the other day that people who wanted to buy black stockings had better buy them soon, because they were now being dyed with foreign dyes that were fast colors, and that probably they would be dyed soon with American dyes that were not fast colors. It has taken a long while to attain that. Gentlemen here can easily remember that when making purchases a few years ago the question that was always asked in reference to colored goods was, Are the colors fast? and as a rule they were not. In the last few years most colors are fast and do not wash out rapidly, at least, and do not fade out rapidly. We have not fully learned the art. The Bureau of Standards might help in that direction very materially at this time, but I notice the appropriation is only $5,000. That will employ one competent scientific man and pay expenses if they will give him the dyestuffs, but would not buy any dyestuffs to operate at the present price.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. There is a provision in the Agricultural bill making an appropriation—I have forgotten the amount—and authorizing the Bureau of Chemistry to take up the matter which the gentleman is discussing.

Mr. MANN. The Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture, efficient as it is, so far as really scientific work is concerned, can not be compared with the work done by the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The lack of dyestuffs in the country is not due to a lack of material but a lack of ability to use the material?

Mr. MANN. I think that is now, in the main, true, although probably the principal cause of the lack of dyestuffs being produced in this country is that it takes a long training to do it well; and, secondly, comparatively cheap labor; and we have not had either one of those.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has been stated in hearings before the Ways and Means Committee and, to my knowledge, to be the fact that the real reason for the lack of dyestuffs in this country is that, in view of the length of time that it takes to perfect the system of manufacture and the capital necessary to be employed, there is no protection to the manufacturer under existing law, and he will not invest or undertake to go into so serious a business as the dye business unless he can be assured that there will be a tariff law to protect him for a time.

Mr. MANN. I think that is true, although I was not seeking to interject any partisan or tariff proposition into this. I take it that the Department of Agriculture, in most of the work, would probably be in connection with obtaining dyestuffs from natural growths.

We have a great many plants and woods in this country that produce dyestuffs to which we have paid no attention at all, but the aniline dyes made from coal-tar products have been developed to the very highest degree by the people on the other side of the water. Whatever we do, we ought to do now, if we want to give some help. I do not believe that $5,000 will do very much, and I am trying to get the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] to see whether he will not be willing, under the circumstances of the case, with the exigency which now exists, to give to this department what it thinks it can profitably use, because we are up against the dyestuff proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I know it is usually stated that it is necessary to have very extensive and very expensive plants for these dye works. I know they do have such. I want to ask the gentleman if he can advise us if that is really necessary or can the dyes be ecomonically manufactured with smaller and cheaper plants?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know enough about the dye question to even give a tinge of red to white. I do not know anything about it, but I know this, that we are up against it on the dyestuff question. I know that we have not yet learned the making of high-grade dyes which are fast colors. I am told, though I do not know it, that there is no way of coloring the cotton crop or the wool produced this year if something is not done. If the Bureau of Standards can be of some benefit to all of these people in helping them to manufacture the high-grade dyes, we ought to give them that asistance at this time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman I am sure is aware of the fact that the Bureau of Standards is now doing some work along the development of color standards. The committee was out there a few weeks ago, and this work was pointed out by the director.

Mr. MANN. I regretfully say that I have not been out there for a long time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The original estimate submitted by the director for this particular item was $10,000. A year ago he asked for $5,000 and the year before that for $7,500. This is the first time that the committee has acted favorably upon the estimate. Out of the $10,000, according to his statement, he proposed to expend $740 for equipment and supplies, $200 for traveling, and the remainder, $9,000, was to be paid out in salaries, none of which was to be greater than $2,400. That is, the salary which he states that he will fix for the expert in color analysis was to be $2,400. The others were laboratory assistants—3 at $1,200, 2 at $900, and 8 at $700; and a laboratory apprentice at $540. As I stated, the director is now using part of his present force in this particular work, and, in view of that fact, the committee felt that $5,000 would enable him to properly and fully carry on this work.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I withdrew a point of order with reference to an item respecting cotton and tobacco, which, it if goes into the law, as it will now, will cost the Government a very considerable sum of money. I said then what I regret to ever call attention to, that while we are generally quite liberal to our friends who raise tobacco and cotton in expenditures especially designed for them, it is very hard to get them to feel reciprocal when our own industries are at stake. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will prove now to the House that I was mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. In view of the difficulties prevailing throughout the country on account of the dyestuff situation, and in view of the equipment of the Bureau of Standards for experiment in this matter, would not the gentleman be willing to increase this appropriation sufficiently to enable the Bureau of Standards to purchase the necessary materials in order to make experiments?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and also to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the committee had no disposition or intention of doing anything to prevent the bureau from performing all the work necessary in order to develop color standards and the other work authorized under this item. We fully appreciate the importance of this work, particularly at this time.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is perfectly familiar with the general distress and trouble throughout all of these industries in the country which need dyes, and we are reaching out for every possible source and avenue that suggests itself to try and help out the situation, and it does seem to me that the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] opens an avenue that offers some hope of assistance in the matter, if the gentleman would consent to a little larger appropriation for the purpose of enabling the Bureau of Standards to purchase the necessary materials to make the experiment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, in justice to the Committee on Appropriations, that it has always felt extremely favorable toward the work of the Bureau of Standards, realizing to the fullest the great work it has accomplished and the great value of that work, and that fact appears in this bill. It has recommended appropriations for four new items of investigation amounting to $25,000, by way of increase for special investigations. With respect to the remark made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] regarding cotton and tobacco, I desire to assure the gentleman that I am not so restricted in my views or so narrow as to simply want to secure appropriations for products which are of great importance in my own section of the country, and particularly in the district from which I come. The gentleman from Illinois has the privilege, of course, of offering an amendment, and for my part I am willing to vote for it. I will state to the gentleman that all the Director of the Bureau of Standards asked for in this particular item was the sum of $10,000.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. MANN. Let me offer the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. All right.

Mr. MANN. Page 134, line 16, strike out "five thousand" and insert "ten thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 134, line 16, strike out "five thousand" and insert "ten thousand."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I defer to the gentleman from Georgia, who has asked for recognition, and he yielded to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois will simply yield to me a moment, I will then yield back to him, as I do not care to make a long speech. I merely wish to remind the gentleman from Tennessee of the fact that he knows—and I think the gentleman recollects it—that the dyestuff trouble pervades the entire country. It does not relate to any particular part of the country, and I want to tell him that, as proud as I am of the Bureau of Standards, I am not assisting in this matter solely on account of my affection for that bureau. I love the Bureau of Standards as an instrument in this case just like the negro loved the negro who fell into the water with the fish bait in his pocket. He had to help him, because he wanted to get the bait; and I love the Bureau of Standards in this case because I want its aid as an instrumentality to help us in the dyestuff trouble. That is all, and I believe the adoption of this amendment will help that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I simply want to say that I believe I can speak for the committee having charge of this bill to the effect that they have no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think what is sought by the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Georgia, and other Members here will be accomplished by increasing this appropriation unless we change the phraseology of the text.

The organization of this bureau as at present provides for the standardization of colors so far as cottonseed oil is concerned or oleomargarine or butter and the like. There is no intention to go into the subject of the manufacture of dyes or the analysis of the methods of manufacture.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman refers to the hearings. I suppose he is referring to that portion of the hearing I read to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I did not have the time to read it all. The director of the bureau states, in addition to what I have already read:

We can do a little of that work, but we are not doing it fast enough; and, furthermore, present conditions have brought about some very serious problems in connection with color, and that is why I increase the estimate this year. The questions of fastness of dyes and color specification that come up in our own manufacture have now become very serious.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not conflict with what I said a moment ago. It is not intended to authorize the Bureau of Standards to go into the subject of processes as to the manufacture of dyestuffs. Now, in the chemical laboratory they have an equipment and have men to do that kind of work, and I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether he objects, so there will be no question as to authority, to accepting an amendment that I suggest, and that is, insert after the word "of," in line 10, page 134, the words "manufacture and of," so as to read "to develop color standards and methods of manufacture and of color measurement"——

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. RUBEY. In the Agricultural appropriation bill we make an appropriation of $50,000 for the identical thing that the gentlemen here are seeking.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I am quite aware of that provision which has already been called to my attention, but I wish to emphasize this fact, that anyone who is cognizant of the work and the establishment of the Bureau of Standards knows full well that that is the proper establishment to do this work, and, furthermore, with the exigency confronting the country, that conditions are serious in the manufacturing world. We are deprived of our dyestuffs, subject to the embargo of Great Britain who will not allow them to be released from Germany.

Anyone who is acquainted with the hearing given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House knows that a crisis is confronting the manufacturing interests of this country, not only in the textile industry but in stationery and all the allied lines—tanning, leather, and all the ramifications running through manufacturing. Now, the Bureau of Standards have an equipment which the Agricultural Department has not. It is acquainted with the methods and it can make this investigation, and while the Agricultural Department may have some fundamentals down there to help and assist, the only proper establishment to do this work is the Bureau of Standards. Now, let us provide phraseology that will keep this so that it will be able to go ahead in reference to a pressing demand of the manufacturing world to-day.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman explain the difference between the purpose of the Department of Agriculture and their Bureau of Chemistry and the Bureau of Standards with reference to the purposes for which they desire to use this money?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield.

Mr. DYER. In a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, referring to this increase of appropriation for the Bureau of Chemistry, he asks for $50,000, which, I understand, the committee has recommended. Now, what will be the difference to which this money will be applied as the gentleman understands—he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations—and the $10,000 that has been suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to be given to the Bureau of Standards?

Mr. STAFFORD. The main purpose of Dr. Stratton, Chief of the Bureau of Standards, in bespeaking for this amendment, was to establish a standard of color as to certain articles; for instance, cottonseed oil, oleomargarine, butter, and the like. It was not originally insisted that we would go into the question of ascertaining the processes of manufacture which are necessary in the dyestuff industry.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOOD. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this bureau has not authority under the law to investigate the processes of manufacture. It is a Bureau of Standards, and all that it is necessary to know here is to determine the standardization, so far as dyestuffs are concerned, and that is the language of the estimate and in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. On Monday last, when the gentleman from Iowa was perhaps inadvertently out of the Chamber, there was passed the so-called Mann bill——

Mr. GOOD. I was in the Chamber.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, the gentleman is usually here, and I thought he was inadvertently out for a moment. But that bill authorizes the Bureau of Standards to engage in the investigation of the processes of manufacture.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. STAFFORD. Just in one minute. If that bill becomes a law, then, as it is desired, devoutly desired, by the gentleman from Illinois, the author of the bill, there will be no question of the full authority of the Bureau of Standards to undertake this work. I am convinced, from my knowledge of the work of the Bureau of Standards, that if there is any governmental establishment that is going to undertake this work it should be concentrated in one bureau and lodged with the Bureau of Standards.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], I will ask the gentleman if it is not highly probable and almost certain that in arriving at anything like a correct and valuable standardization the Bureau of Standards would learn and announce something of the elements of manufacture?

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly do; and I would make it still broader, so as to meet the exigent condition of the dyestuff industry and of the tanning industry and other industries. I would ask the gentleman if he would have any objection to the insertion of those words, especially in view of the bill that passed the House last Wednesday authorizing that very character of work, so that there would be no question of the Bureau of Standards having the right to go into the question involved—that is, the processes as to the manufacture of dyestuffs.

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he should ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] if he would not modify his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hear something of an undercurrent here, Mr. Chairman, to the effect that the distinguished representatives of the Committee on Agriculture will raise a point of order. I think there is some room for investigation on the part of two bureaus. Of course they are all desirous of spreading the power of the Department of Agriculture, and its desire is not only to confine itself within its own arena properly, but to extend it to outside fields of investigation, such as mercantile investigations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. His amendment supplements the worthy amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], increasing the appropriation for the Bureau of Standards from five to ten thousand dollars. The general public to-day is treated to such a volume of war news that there is danger of forgetting the industrial conditions of this country. There is no question but that a crisis confronts the manufacturers of this country, particularly in textile lines, and for that reason we ought to be as generous as we possibly can in aiding the development of the dye industry in this country. I think the most inadvisable time to cut down any appropriation asked by a bureau of such well-known efficiency as the Bureau of Standards is now. It has done a very remarkable work for this country, and if it has a personnel capable of solving this great problem, if it is capable of aiding in any measure to lift the great load and the great burden off the shoulders of the manufacturers of this country, the attempt should be encouraged, because it means that labor is threatened and prosperity is involved.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will.

Mr. DYER. I take it that the gentleman, of course, is conversant with the fact that this question is so important and world-wide that practically every country is taking it up seriously?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Absolutely.

My DYER. Great Britain has appropriated £80,000 to establish research laboratories for this very purpose.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Precisely. Every manufacturing country finds that it is absolutely dependent upon the Germans for dyes. Possibly none of them looked for this great conflict which has brought about so serious a condition in the industrial world, and for that reason I join with the gentleman from Wisconsin in the hope that every agency we have under our Government will be joined in the solution of this great problem.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman explain why or how the other countries have allowed this industry to be taken up almost entirely by Germany heretofore?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I suppose it is because Germany has outstripped other countries in the race. The other countries found that Germany was capable of manufacturing dyes more cheaply, and they probably adopted a policy of laissez faire.

Mr. FESS. Is it because the university idea has taken a deeper hold on the people of Germany than on the people of every other country?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. There is not a question about that. I think that in Germany there is a degree of efficiency in certain lines that we will be years in attaining, and we always have something to learn. Let us learn it now. Let us go into the manufacture of dyes if we have the ability to do it, and if we can find the capital to do it. I think this Government ought to give its aid and encouragement to those who are willing to undertake this great labor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Agriculture appreciating the need of the country has made a recommendation and furnished an estimate to the Committee on Agriculture, covering this very matter; and the committee, in its bill, reported a few days ago, recommends an appropriation of $50,000 for "investigation and experiment in the utilization for coloring purposes of raw materials grown or produced in the United States." It seems to me that if this appropriation is made the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture will undertake to carry on the very work the House wishes to have done.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. If I understand correctly, the base of most of the dyestuffs used in the textile industries is aniline, a coal-tar product. What particular connection had the Department of Agriculture with a purely manufacturing matter like aniline dyes?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The Department of Agriculture will take up the entire subject of experimenting with different products from which coloring matter and dyestuffs are or can be produced—agricultural products and other products.

Mr. BORLAND. Instead of putting a $50,000 appropriation in the Agricultural bill in order to do something that the agricultural branch of the Government is not equipped to do, would it not be a great deal better to put a more modest appropriation in the hands of the proper department and let them do it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, no bureau of the Government is now equipped properly to carry on this work, and we anticipate that this recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture, when it is reached, will be approved, and that the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture will be authorized to equip itself to undertake to carry on this work. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to furnish money for another bureau to buy machinery and equip itself to carry on the same work. The policy of duplicating work of this sort ought not to be encouraged or permitted, and, where the danger of duplication is pointed out, this Congress ought not to permit it.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will pardon me, he admits that the Bureau of Chemistry would have to equip itself to do this work. Now, what is the use of that bureau equipping itself to do the work when another department of the Government is already equipped for that purpose?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The Department of Agriculture has evidently been doing some work along this line—how much I do not know.

Mr. BORLAND. None.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do not remember the hearings on that point, but the Agricultural Department does work of this kind, and does it right.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows that the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture is almost entirely concerned with the investigation of food products, and it has a great deal of work to do in that branch of its activities, very much more work than it has been able to accomplish. Why should it leave its own field and go into a purely general product.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Is it the intention of the Department of Agriculture to go into the subject of coal-tar preparations?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think it is the purpose of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture to investigate the entire subject of utilizing products of all kinds from which coloring matters can be produced. My understanding is that the Bureau of Standards is not authorized to take up this kind of work. The Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture has the authority, and my judgment is that the bureau having authority ought to be given an appropriation and authorized and directed to carry on the work if Congress wishes to avoid or prevent duplication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that some of the members of the Committee on Agriculture seem to think that it is their duty to be opposed to a thing like this. I would be quite willing at this time and under existing conditions to give each department $100,000 if they could profitably make use of it. [Applause.]

The lack of dyestuffs is liable and likely to cost the people of this country many millions of dollars. I want to give a little illustration. A few years ago we were held up short by the monopoly in Germany with reference to potash. Certain contracts which had been made with mine owners overnight, when the monopoly had disappeared for a few minutes, were canceled and the price of potash was put up. There came into the House the sundry civil bill and the Agricultural appropriation bill. In the sundry civil bill we provided an appropriation that the Interior Department might search for potash in this country and in the Agricultural bill we provided an appropriation that the Agriculture Department might search for potash in this country. Neither one up to date has been overly successful, although it is possible that the information which either one has acquired will result in our obtaining a fairly plentiful supply of potash. Both committees at that time were inclined to resent the idea that the other committee was trying to do something, just as the Agriculture Committee seems to be now opposed to having anything come through the Committee on Appropriations. I doubt whether the item in the agricultural bill is in order, and yet I hope that no point of order will be made upon it. We can afford to put both departments at work, and if there is rivalry between them, so much the better [applause], because once there is rivalry they will do their best work. I hope the rivalry will keep up in reference to potash until we discover a method of commercially producing potash.

But we can not just now afford to quarrel about who is to do this work, when we can find and obtain men in both departments to do that work, of the utmost value to our county, our manufactories, and our people.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan seems to be of the opinion that the work to be carried on under this appropriation does not properly fall among the duties of the Bureau of Standards. I will say that the hearing before the Ways and Means Committee showed one branch of this matter peculiarly within the province of the Bureau of Standards. It developed the fact that the making of dyes from coal-tar products, from which most of the dyes are derived, was a highly technical subject upon which no one in this country was supposed to have the skill and great technical attainments that have been cultivated in Germany. The result would be that at first on certain kinds of dyes they would be to a certain extent more or less of an experiment; some would be perfect and some would be imperfect, and that I take it is the particular thing that we want the Bureau of Standards to determine—whether certain dyes that are put out are suitable for the purpose.

Now, in response to the question asked by the gentleman from Ohio a short time ago, I will say that the hearings on this subject also developed that the progress of the industry in Germany was not due alone to the scientific progress or efficiency that has been so much cultivated and acquired and raised to such a height. To a considerable extent the monopoly that Germany possesses in this class of business was owing to the peculiar system of laws which encourages and develops a home monopoly to prevent it from being developed in other countries. I shall not expand upon that now for the reason that when the dyestuffs bill comes before the House it will be fully explained, but that had a great deal to do with the development of the monopoly.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. As I understand, it was not a lack of skill here entirely, and, of course, not a lack of material, but an interference by competition that we did not have a supply of dyes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We do not lack material, and I do not know that we lack scientific knowledge, but it has not been developed, and one reason that it has not been developed has been this system that Germany adopted to crush out competition.

Mr. DYER and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that in recognizing Members to talk upon this item it is his purpose to give preference to those who have not already spoken. The Chair, therefore, will recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I concur in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] increasing this appropriation. I think we could well afford to spend a great deal of money for the purpose of endeavoring to develop this industry, which is indeed one of the most important at the present time of any that I know of. We ought to endeavor to get all of the information we possibly can. I do not agree with the suggestion to amend as proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] changing the wording of this provision in the bill as to how the money shall be used. I think the Bureau of Chemistry in the Department of Agriculture can better do the work of investigation than the Bureau of Standards, and, Mr. Chairman, in connection with that I desire to offer a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he goes into this subject, not in any great detail, but in which he furnishes some very valuable information, which I think will be of benefit to us in connection with this matter. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1916.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: In the estimates of appropriations for the fiscal year 1917, under the heading "General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry," page 229, appears the following item:

For investigation and experiment in the utilization, for coloring purposes, of raw materials grown or produced in the United States (submitted)..... $20,000

When the estimates of the department were under consideration it seemed desirable to develop only the research laboratory devoted to this subject in the Bureau of Chemistry with a comparatively small force and equipment. It was thought that $20,000 would be sufficient for this purpose. Recent developments in the dye situation, however, have shown that the aid to industry which can be effected through the expenditure of this sum is not commensurate with the importance of the project. It is now believed that $50,000 will be required to undertake the work properly. It is proposed to expend this sum in the employment of research chemists and the complete equipment of a research laboratory, which will be supplemented by large apparatus designed for the handling of material upon a manufacturing scale for the purpose of applying to industrial conditions chemical reactions which have been worked out by laboratory methods. The equipment of such a plant will require large expenditures for apparatus, such as stills, retorts, electric motors, etc. I have the honor, therefore, to inclose herewith, for transmission to the Congress, to be included in the Agricultural appropriation bill, a supplemental estimate of $30,000 to enable the department to carry on certain investigations and experiments in the utilization for coloring purposes of raw materials grown or produced in the United States. It is suggested that this sum be added to the amount carried by the item quoted above, making a total of $50,000 for the purpose.

The following facts indicate clearly the necessity for undertaking systematic work in connection with the production of dye materials:

1. The results of investigations in the manufacture of synthetic dyestuffs and the utilization of raw materials, both natural and artificial, for the manufacture of dyes will tend to place this country in the position where it is independent of foreign manufacture. Manufacturers in this country have been unable to produce economically the coloring substances required in the industries on account of the fact that very little scientific investigation has been directed to this end in the United States. It is hoped to work out practical methods for utilizing domestic products in the manufacture of dyes and to secure further data concerning the coloring substances, both natural and artificial, which are found in food products. If proper methods are developed it is believed that this country can economically produce all necessary coloring substances.

2. Some of the great agricultural interests in this country are largely dependent upon dyes and are greatly curtailed and put to financial loss through the rise in the price of dyestuffs and the lack of a sufficient and constantly available supply. The agricultural interests most affected are the growers of cotton and the raisers of sheep, since merchantable cotton and woolen fabrics require a considerable quantity and variety of dyestuffs.

It is well known that certain products of agriculture produce dyes of commercial importance. In fact, at one time in the world's history the only dyes available were of vegetable origin. It is possible that work of value may be done to facilitate the production and utilization of these dyes and that it may tend to the discovery of means for the employment of waste products of agriculture in the dye industry.

3. Investigations of this nature seem to be directly the province of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, since this bureau has been engaged in the investigation of dyestuffs, more particularly in connection with food products, for over 10 years. Many of the dyes which are found in food products and have from time to time been employed for their coloration are the identical dyes which are largely employed in the textile industries. There is no other department in the Government so well fitted to carry on these investigations as the Bureau of Chemistry.

A large variety of dyestuffs is imported into the United States. The quantity made in this country is limited. While it would seem possible for manufacturers in this country to produce in sufficient quantities all the varieties of dyes required to supply the industries of the country, many processes have not been developed in America to the extent that they have in other countries. Refined chemical knowledge and great technical skill are necessary in the manufacture of many of the dyestuffs, and much research by chemists is required in order to study the involved reactions for the purpose of determining the conditions necessary to the production of satisfactory and profitable yields. It is well known that almost all dyestuffs are easily produced by chemists in the laboratory, where the question of practical yield, as compared with the maximum theoretically obtainable, is of minor importance. In manufacturing processes, however, it is not sufficient to produce the dye. It is necessary to make as large a quantity as possible from a given quantity of raw material. Unless this is done the manufacture can not be profitable. Much scientific work to accomplish such results can be carried on in the Bureau of Chemistry in aid of the chemical industries, and it is known that manufacturers will welcome cooperation of this nature by the department.

In this connection it may be stated that the department is informed that the British Government has just appropriated £80,000 for the equipment of a research laboratory designed to carry on work similar to that which it is proposed to do in the Bureau of Chemistry, but doubtless on a more extensive scale.

Respectfully,
D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the district which I have the honor to represent is very deeply interested in this subject now before the House. I think we have about 15 different plants in that district that are compelled to have dyes in connection with the manufacture of hosiery and underwear, and I want to say for the information of the House and of the country that in the last few months we have commenced the construction in east Tennessee of a coal-tar plant, costing $3,000,000, that will give employment to about 3,000 people. I give this notice now as an advertisement that we will be soon ready to supply at least a portion of the country with what we have along this line.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the argument in favor of the manufacturers, and I desire to state that the laboring men and the consumers of the country are interested just as much in this matter as are the manufacturers. From letters that I have received from local merchants who distribute articles of merchandise affected by dyes, clothing, and so on, I learn that the lack of dyes is making a great deal of difference to the common laboring people, whose wages are no higher than they have been. It makes a difference to them in buying the everyday things that they need in ordinary clothing. Therefore, in the interest of the manufacturers and in the interest of the entire country, in the interest of the men, women, and children who wear the articles of manufacture, I favor the increase in this appropriation.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I will consume but a very short time. I want to speak of the importance of this appropriation. It is a mere bagatelle in comparison to the amount of money that the increase in the price of dyestuffs is costing our people this year. Several gentlemen appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and gave testimony respecting this matter. One gentleman testified that he was in the habit of ordering dyestuffs in a quantity amounting to about $1,150 for each order. That was the usual amount of the order. He said that at the present time he was having a shipment come in from China of the same amount of dyestuffs, but that he was paying $52,500 for what he had heretofore paid $1,150. In other words, testimony was furnished in great abundance that in this country we are using annually about $15,000,000 worth of dyestuffs chiefly made in Germany. There are $100,000,000 worth of dyestuffs consumed in the world annually. This year, according to the testimony furnished to the Ways and Means Committee, the people of this country will pay from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 for dyestuffs that they have heretofore paid but $15,000,000 for. What does this item amount to, if we can establish that industry in this country? We have the raw material, it has been abundantly testified to; we have the money, we have the skill; and the only thing that is necessary is adequate protection to the industry in this country against the cheap products coming from Germany. Every time there has been an attempt to establish the industry in this country, the cheap material from Germany was sold at a price below the cost of production in this country, and our German friends abroad have used what they call their "yellow-dog fund"—a fund laid aside to be used in furnishing those products in this country at a price below cost—in order to prevent the production or the establishment of that industry in this country. Let us make the appropriation and in a small way prepare to establish the industry here.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If the gentleman is right in saying that we have the machinery, that we know the processes, and we have the money and all that, why is it necessary to make any of these appropriations to discover the process?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not say that we had the machinery. I said that we had the raw material and that we had the skill and the desire to produce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield? We have no protection sufficient to insure the perpetuity of the business if American capitalists should engage in it. Is not that true?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement, there is one minute remaining of the 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think that this sort of legislation is really important and justifiable. Much legislation here looking to the expenditure of money is simply to keep the concern going, but here is a proposal not only to keep the concern going but to discover new things and by the expenditure of a dollar probably we will get much more than that in return. It is a matter of research and giving the scholars working in this particular line the wherewithal to find out the things that we do not now know, and for that reason I would very gladly join anyone here in voting $100,000 if it could be used by the bureau and used in a sensible manner in order that we might reap the advantages of such work. This is a case where you are trying to make two blades grow where now only one grows, and I think we ought to adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement of the committee, all debate is closed on the paragraph and all amendments thereto, and, without objection, the Clerk will report the pending amendment, which now will be voted upon.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold it for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. I will withhold it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been terminated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 134, line 10, after the word "of," insert the words "manufacture and of," so that the line as amended will read: "to develop color standards and methods of manufacture and of color measurements"—

And so forth.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate was limited and closed by order of the committee. If the gentleman desires to make the point of order, the Chair will hear him; if not, the Chair will permit the committee to vote on the amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, if I can not discuss the amendment I will not make the point of order against it, but I think it is clearly additional legislation. It does not come under the Holeman rule. The only point I want to make is this: We have an appropriation in the Agricultural bill. We put this new language into this bill and then when we come in here with our appropriation to give you $50,000 for this purpose it will be said, "You are duplicating work," and somebody will make a point of order and the item will go out, so that instead of having $50,000 for use in this work we will be limited to $10,000. I will now withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and allow the committee to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To study methods of measurement and technical processes used in the manufacture of pottery, brick, tile, terra cotta, and other clay products, and the study of the properties of the materials used in that industry, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $5,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to get some information as to what is proposed to be done by this paragraph. There is nothing here except what is in the hearing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; there is nothing except what is found in the hearing. It is for the investigation of clay products. The director is very clear, I think, in his statement in the hearings as to exactly what he expects to do with this appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER. It is proposed to go into the manufacture of these products?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this appropriation is allowed, the bureau proposes to take up the chemical control of fluidity in casting clay wares; the production of high-grade white ware from American material; the production of refractory glass pots by mixtures of American clays; the preparation of color and enameled compositions for clay ware and glass for the makers of such material; the preparation of optical glass; and the development of refractory synthetic products.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the statement that appears in the hearings, with which the gentleman is no doubt familiar, as showing the value of this particular work. The director said:

At the present time we are dependent upon foreign sources for all optical glass used in the manufacture of telescopes and a great variety of optical instruments, but the bureau has enabled the manufacturers of clay products to replace all foreign clays with our own; as a result the chemical porcelain industry has been established in this country. Domestic fire clays have been shown equal to those imported, and are now replacing the latter.

This appropriation is intended to permit the bureau to make these scientific investigations, which the gentleman, I am sure, realizes are very valuable and important.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it already doing this kind of work?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been doing this kind of work for a long time with the permanent force which has been supplied to the bureau. But as the gentleman will notice, this is a very slight appropriation for the purpose of enabling the bureau to extend its work along this line.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it proposed to go out and look up certain clays and materials of that kind for the purpose of manufacture?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and to investigate their value and adaptability for commercial use.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not make a point of order on this paragraph. This is an extremely important item. I will state to the gentleman that as the result of the scientific investigation made by the Bureau of Standards with reference to our clay products, the bureau has discovered clay products in certain States which have been found to be extremely valuable; and just as I stated a while ago, it has resulted in establishing the commercial porcelain industry of this country. If the gentleman will go to the Bureau of Standards and investigate this particular feature of its work and see what has already been accomplished, I am sure he will recognize the importance of this work.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not believe it is the business of the Bureau of Standards to go out into the field and search for these clays.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do not go into the field.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the gentleman said they did.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I did not intend to be so understood. On the contrary, these clays are sent to the bureau for examination and analysis. The work is done here in the bureau. The bureau does not follow the practice of going out into the field and searching for these clays.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not seem to me to be the function of the Bureau of Standards to do those things. Its function is to standardize, not to do things of that kind.

Mr. BORLAND. The Bureau of Standards has been doing a great deal of work relating to the technical processes of manufacture. They have investigated a number of American clays suitable for lining furnaces to see what their resisting powers are against fire, and as to their smoothness and porosity, to see if they were adapted to use in furnaces. That is one line of their activity. Then they have a line of investigation on the clays suitable for pottery, from the cheaper grades up to the better grades. They have an analysis of the chemical qualities, and this enables the manufacturers to use that technical knowledge.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this only to investigate technical matters that come to them in that way—testing their properties and effecting their standardization? Is that the intention?

Mr. BORLAND. That is the intention. The gentleman will readily see that an appropriation of $5,000 would not enable them to pursue elaborate tests and researches in the field. It only enables them to test such specimens as are sent to them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] make the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce: For contingent and miscellaneous expenses of the offices and bureaus of the department, for which appropriations for contingent and miscellaneous expenses are not specifically made, including purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, periodicals, blank books, pamphlets, maps, newspapers (not exceeding $2,500); stationery, furniture and repairs to same, carpets, matting, oilcloth, file cases, towels, ice, brooms, soap, sponges, fuel, lighting and heating; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and care of horses, horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles, and motor-propelled trucks, and bicycles, to be used only for official purposes; freight and express charges, postage to foreign countries, telegraph and telephone service, typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices, including their repair and exchange; repairs to building occupied by offices of the Secretary of Commerce; storage of documents belonging to the Bureau of Lighthouses, not to exceed $1,500; street-car tickets, not exceeding $300; and all other miscellaneous items and necessary expenses not included in the foregoing, $57,000, and in addition thereto sums amounting to $49,450 shall be deducted from other appropriations made for the fiscal year 1917 and added to the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce," in order to facilitate the purchase through the central purchasing office as provided in the act of June 17, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 531), of certain supplies for bureaus and offices for which contingent and miscellaneous appropriations are specifically made as follows: Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce—Investigating cost of production $3,700, promoting commerce $4,500, promoting commerce (South and Central America) $3,000, commercial attachés $4,500; general expenses, Lighthouse Service, $10,000; contingent expenses, Steamboat-Inspection Service, $5,000; contingent expenses, shipping service, $500; instruments for measuring vessels, $500; instruments for counting passengers, $250; enforcement of wireless-communication laws, $1,000; Bureau of Standards—equipment $1,500, general expenses $2,000; general expenses, Coast and Geodetic Survey, $4,500; miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Fisheries, $8,500; and the said total sum of $106,450 shall be and constitute the appropriation for contingent expenses, Department of Commerce, to be expended through the central purchasing office (Division of Supplies), Department of Commerce, and shall also be available for objects and purposes of the several appropriations mentioned under the title "Contingent expenses, Department of Commerce," in this act.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I notice that in this section there is reference to the Steamboat-Inspection Service, which makes in order the few remarks which I wish to make.

I was in the Chamber when the Steamboat-Inspection Service was under discussion and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] called attention to the fact that salaries are provided for four additional inspectors at the port of Providence at $1,800, while in other places the salary was $1,600. I was at a loss, as he was, to know the reason why, and I made it my business to call up the Chief of the Steamboat-Inspection Service, and I was informed—and I think it be well to put it in the RECORD—that the salaries are based upon the quantity of work performed and are fixed and determined under a law of many years' standing.

I was further informed that in many instances these men—to whom my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] paid such a well-deserved tribute, calling attention to the mechanical knowledge that they must possess in order to do the work required of them, and that their salaries were not over great for the work performed—that in many instances these men go to work at 5 o'clock in the morning and continue at work until 6 o'clock at night——

Mr. MADDEN. And sometimes all night——

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Yes; and sometimes all night. And that the inspection of steamboats is now more difficult than it was some years ago. It is more exacting, and it requires a greater degree of skill and efficiency. I was further informed that the work of these men had been largely increased by the recently passed seamen's law, and that in a great many cases there is a clerical shortage. In consequence of that inspectors are performing on typewriters instead of inspecting vessels. I believe in some places there are local boards consisting of an inspector of hulls and an inspector of boilers. In ports like New York and Boston and other large centers they have many additional or assistant inspectors; but in places where the local boards constitute the entire force they are not only clerks but laborers, mechanics, and supervisors, if you please; men who issue certificates and men who issue licenses. I believe such a port is that at New London. They have to examine all the men who apply for positions on the boats, and they have to inspect the boats and do clerical work and all that sort of thing.

It is a work that has grown tremendously. Now, as a sample of the inequality that pertains I am told that the work on the Great Lakes at the present time is very congested, and that men from Philadelphia and New York have been sent to the Great Lakes, where the salary is $1,600, while the salary at the port of New York is $2,000 and the salary at Philadelphia, I believe, $1,800; so that we have an example of a $2,000 man, a $1,800 man, and a $1,600 man all doing the same identical work at a very great difference in pay. I am told, further, that the bureau is very anxious to standardize the work, to increase the salaries of these men, which, I believe, have remained stationary for some 25 or 30 years, if I am correctly informed. But they felt that Congress would not lend a willing ear to the proposition to increase the salaries. So, if there is any objection to increasing the salaries, it does not lie with the bureau, but with Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Department of Labor.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 12207, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BROWN OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Mr. PLATT, has notified the Speaker that he can not attend the funeral of Mr. BROWN of West Virginia, and the Chair appoints Mr. AUSTIN, of Tennessee, in his place.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 19. An act relating to bills of lading in interstate and foreign commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 3984. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4399. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 40. An act to authorize agricultural entries on surplus coal lands in Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 43. An act in relation to the location entry and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the States of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substance, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 137. An act for the relief of Omer D. Lewis; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 136. An act for the relief of Eva M. Bowman; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 67. An act for the relief of Mathilda P. Hansen; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 54. An act to provide for the refunding of certain moneys illegally assessed and collected in the district of Utah; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 142. An act for the relief of Mrs. George A. Miller; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 540. An act for the relief of Fred B. Balano; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 53. An act for the relief of the Eldredge Brothers Live Stock Co., a corporation; to the Committee on Claims.

S. J. Res. 65. Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9225. An act granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BROWNING, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

FORT SILL MILITARY RESERVATION, OKLA.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call from the Speaker's desk H. R. 403 and move to concur in the Senate amendment. It is an unimportant amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 403) granting to the State of Oklahoma permission to occupy a certain portion of the Fort Sill Military Reservation, Okla., and to maintain and operate thereon a fish hatchery. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "improvement," insert the words "or property."

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

HOURS OF DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a statement which has been prepared, not by myself, but by some one else, giving the standpoint of the clerks in reference to the Borland amendment. It is a short statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the RECORD a statement giving the status of the departmental clerks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CERTAIN LOTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3509) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed to the persons hereinafter named for part of a lot in the District of Columbia, and the same was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I asked permission heretofore to extend my remarks in the RECORD, on the 7th of this month, but by mistake I left out four pages, and I want to know if I may be permitted to extend my remarks again by putting in what I left out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks leave to insert in his speech already printed certain remarks which he omitted.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman had that leave heretofore.

Mr. LINDBERGH. Yes; I had that leave some time ago.

Mr. MANN. There was no leave to extend remarks last Thursday.

Mr. LINDBERGH. No; not last Thursday.

Mr. MANN. Although the gentleman inserted remarks under leave to print, I hope he will make the request now to extend his remarks, and put it all in.

Mr. LINDBERGH. I will do that. I understood I had the consent before. I did not know that it made any difference what day I put it in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN rose.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman moves to adjourn I would like to ask the gentleman when he expects to take up the sugar bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. As soon as we get through with the legislative bill.

Mr. MANN. Assuming that we get through with the legislative bill to-morrow, does the gentleman intend to occupy Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am hoping to make some arrangement with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. He is anxious to get up the juvenile court bill, but I am hoping that I can prevail upon him to let us have that day.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to address the House to-morrow morning for 10 minutes immediately after reading the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 10 minutes after the reading of the Journal and the clearing of the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman tell us what it is about.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is not on the Borland amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. I am somewhat interested in that, but will the gentleman tell us what it is?

Mr. AUSTIN. I prefer not to state at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he has been appointed on the committee to attend the funeral of the late Representative BROWN, and the train leaves to-night at 12 o'clock.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me to attend, because I am interested in the Borland amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee can not attend, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. GREENE. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to occupy 10 minutes to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 11, 1916, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of a joint resolution authorizing the admission without the payment of duty of certain dry colors for inks to be used by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing (H. SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 11, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Author of Peace and Lover of Concord, look from Thy throne upon us this day. Be pleased to endue us plenteously with heavenly wisdom that all our work begun, continued, and ended in Thee may redound to the honor and glory of Thy name.

Our times are in Thy hands. Thou dost order the affairs of nations. If in Thy will we are called to make sacrifice of blood to maintain the essential rights of men, may the sacrifice be made in the spirit of Thy Son. And grant, we pray Thee, to so order the course of all our national affairs that we may ever hold in mind that there is no glory apart from the performance of Thy will, and that essential greatness is the greatness of character and fitness for service with God in the world.

Hear us in our prayer. Guide us in the discharge of the duties of this day. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Borah	Hughes	O'Gorman	Sterling
Brandegee	James	Oliver	Stone
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Sutherland

Cummins	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Warren
Curtis	Lee, Md.	Sheppard	Williams
Dillingham	McCumber	Sherman	Works
Fall	Martin, Va.	Simmons
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12843) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8493) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUSSELL of Missouri, Mr. ASHBROOK, and Mr. LANGLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9225) granting the consent of Congress to Georgia Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Flint River, Ga., between Dooly and Sumter Counties, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Hudson Grange, No. 11, Patrons of Husbandry, of Hudson, N. H., and a petition of 14 citizens of Hudson, N. H., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA. I present the petition of F. Emory Lyon, superintendent of the Central Howard Association of Chicago, Ill., in reference to prison-made goods. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 29, 1916.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the consideration by Congress of House bill No. 6871 and Senate bills Nos. 901, 4060, and 3976, relating to the interstate commerce in prison-made goods. I understand that these bills have been considered by the committees to which they were referred and have been reported for passage.

I take the liberty of writing you as one who is interested in the subject as a result of 15 years' experience in dealing with more than 13,000 released prisoners. As superintendent of the Central Howard Association, I have also had occasion to visit and observe the work of nearly all prisons and reformatories of the United States.

My position in reference to the subject of prison industries is entirely disinterested and is wholly concerned with the best interests of prison inmates and society at large. From this standpoint of humanity, therefore, I take it that the first necessity of any prison is to provide abundant work for the inmates. Next to this fundamental purpose, on the part of the State, should be the desire to prepare men for better citizenship in the future.

I believe further restrictive legislation, as applied to prison industries, would prove a curse rather than a blessing, unless some adequate provision is made for the employment of prisoners. Inasmuch as I see no suggestion of a constructive program in this direction given in the bills above mentioned, I feel that their passage would be harmful to society as a whole; to the physical, mental, and industrial welfare of the present and future generations, and a serious handicap to the efficiency of labor.

I trust, therefore, you will give careful consideration to the present unsatisfactory condition, with reference to prison industries in the various States, to which I would now call your attention.

Under present conditions in most prisons, the "hard-labor" part of the sentence is a gigantic farce and travesty. Scarcely any prison in the country has sufficient employment for its inmates, owing to the restrictive measures already imposed in the change from the private-contract labor system to various forms of State industry. As stated above, my position as between various forms of prison labor is entirely neutral. My principal desire is that men should have work, and, so far as possible, they should be taught trades, not only for their own sake but for the safety and welfare of society in the future.

The movement toward the elimination of private-contract labor has doubtless been welcomed by most intelligent observers. Those who know, however, realize that in the process of change, no State has reached a rational solution of the problem of prison industries.

The employment of prisoners under private contract has been opposed by labor organizations. They have objected to direct competition between prison labor and free labor. Legislatures have harkened to this plea, not usually for the benefit of the State or convict, but as a political measure. Contracts have been canceled in State after State, especially during the past 10 years, while in most cases no adequate substitute has been provided for suitable and sufficient work. On the contrary, in many States the new legislation has definitely limited the use of prison inmates for productive work.

In Missouri we learn of 800 men sitting in their cells day and night, losing their minds and their health. In Ohio one sees 400 men sitting in the "idle house" (in prison of all places under the sun), vacantly staring at each other week after week. Meanwhile the rest of the inmates are learning inefficiency by having one man's job for three men. Many prisoners in Iowa, and other States also, are learning the lesson of idleness, in spite of their sentence to "hard labor," while the officials are striving strenuously to meet the emergency, under the limitations of the laws, to find a way to keep men out of mischief by legitimate occupation.

The situation would not be so serious if it merely marked a transition from one system to another, and if we could see a great promise of improvement, but apparently this is not the case. Pennsylvania and New York States are conspicuous examples of the failure of measures that have been adopted to limit prison industries and to manufacture articles for State use.

These measures were taken ostensibly for reformatory purposes, but it is well known that idleness and insanity to a large extent have been the result. In New York State especially it would seem that an ideal opportunity was afforded to work out the problem in a practical way. It has a population of 10,000,000, and a very large number of State institutions for which manufactured articles were needed.

Even though all these institutions secured their supplies from the State prisons, however, they could not furnish sufficient employment for the 5,000 inmates in the penal institutions. As a result, we have waited in vain for a successful outcome of the various experiments undertaken in that State.

New York has had no contract prison labor for 24 years. That would seem to be sufficient time to substitute some effective, efficient, rational method by which all its prison population could be employed and at a profit to the Commonwealth.

Quite the contrary result is found. The system as a whole is an enormous expense to the State. Practically all of its petty offenders sent to its various large county penitentiaries or "workhouses" are entirely without work. The inmates of its State prisons have insufficient employment, and the extent to which its reformatories teach trades seems to be problematical.

One of its leading experts, Dr. Katherine B. Davis, is authority for the statement that the correctional institutions of New York City, at least, fail to furnish exactly the things we think most essential to good citizenship outside of prison, viz, "the incentive to toil and the efficiency of labor."

As a matter of fact, should not these be the primary purposes of any correctional system? Can we expect them to be realized when the political motive and spirit dominates these institutions? Can we hope to secure the payment of prisoners for themselves or their families—a thing which most people believe to be desirable—until prisons become self-supporting? Nearly all are a burden to the State, either because the products of their industries can not be sold under the laws or because business management is not considered essential to their administration.

If reformatories are to reform, they, too, must be profitable, not necessarily in dollars, but in producing good citizens by process of education and trade training.

The writer is greatly interested in this matter. We believe that untold harm is bound to come from the continued idleness in most of our prisons. It is sure to result in an increase of crime in the future.

Surely the brains of America should be able to solve the prison-labor problem. That it has not done so is due to public indifference, political corruption, and the need of more men of business ability, as well as humanity and vision, to administer all penal institutions efficiently, as a few are now being conducted.

As before stated, we are not here advocating private contract labor or favoring any one form of State industry. We are anxious only that some kind of work be found, and then, if possible, that that work should be profitable and should not disqualify men for better citizenship after their release.

Instead of contributing to this end the legislation now being considered by Congress in the above bills would greatly lessen the possibilities of employment for prisoners, whether by private contract or by State management, since it would destroy the market for prison-made goods. In view of these considerations it is earnestly hoped by many thoughtful citizens that this legislation will not become effective.

Trusting your vote may be given against these measures, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

F. EMORY LYON,
Superintendent the Central Howard Association.

Mr. GRONNA presented a memorial of sundry citizens of North Dakota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in convict-made goods, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the North Dakota State Dental Association, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the Dental Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fargo, N. Dak.; Philadelphia, Pa.; and of Alliance and Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented petitions of the American Federation of Labor and the directors of the port of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to build up a merchant marine, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 537, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the printing of the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 141, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, of Edenvale, Cal., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of Hon. Lewis T. Carpenter, Charles H. Akers, and of the Chamber of Commerce, all of Phoenix, in the State of Arizona, praying for a readjustment of the compensation allowed railroads for carrying the mail, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JAMES. I present a resolution adopted by the Kentucky Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, indorsing the movement for prompt and adequate preparedness for the defense of the country. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., February 18, 1916.

Hon. OLLIE M. JAMES, Senator,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JAMES: At the last meeting of the Kentucky Society of the Sons of the American Revolution the inclosed resolution was adopted, and I was instructed to send a copy to you, and trust you will give same your earnest and careful consideration.

Yours, very truly,

ALEX. W. TIPPETT,
Secretary Kentucky Society Sons of the American Revolution.

Whereas there is an obligation that the Sons of the American Revolution should staunchly advocate those measures which look toward the protection and perpetuity of the rights won and secured by their direct ancestors: Be it

Resolved, That the Kentucky Society of the Sons of the American Revolution indorses the movement for prompt and adequate preparedness for the defense of this country against an attack upon our rights, and thus secure peace with honor in accordance with the tradition and policy of our revolutionary ancestry.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Kentucky Member of the House of Representatives, as well as to the two Senators from Kentucky, and that a copy also be sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. JAMES. I present a communication from the secretary of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Owensboro, Ky., relative to the question of national defense or preparedness. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OWENSBORO, KY., March 4, 1916.

Senators OLLIE M. JAMES, J. C. W. BECKHAM;
Congressmen DAVE H. KINCHELOE, R. Y. THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At the regular monthly meeting of the board of directors of this chamber last Thursday evening the question of national defense, or preparedness, was very generally discussed, and it was the consensus of opinion that our Army and Navy are wholly inadequate for proper defense should our country be attacked by some foreign nation, and that this Congress should see that adequate provision is made for the protection of our home land.

On motion, I was requested to convey to you the views thus expressed and to respectfully request you to use your vote and influence to this end.

Very truly, yours, GEO. H. COX, Secretary.

Mr. JAMES. I have received a letter from the secretary of the Jefferson County Dental Society, of Kentucky, relative to a meeting held by that society concerning the status of the efficiency of the Dental Corps of the Army. I ask that the letter and accompanying communication be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the communications were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., February 19, 1916.

Hon. Senator OLLIE JAMES,
Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: Pursuant to a discussion held in the recent meeting of the Jefferson County Dental Society relative to the status of the efficiency of the Dental Corps of the Army, I was instructed by the unanimous vote of somewhat over 90 members, to respectfully ask you to use your good influence in requesting Senator CHAMBERLAIN to incorporate in his defense bill the recommendations of the legislative committee of the National Dental Association, copy of which find inclosed.

Believing that you are sympathetically interested in advancing the efficiency of this agency of our Army life, which renders such valuable relief to our heroic soldiers, we in confidence seek your cooperation in this matter.

By order of the society I hereby affix the names of our members, who are deeply interested in this recommendation:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 3, 1915.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Complying with your request in our interview this morning, we, the legislative committee of the National Dental Association, submit and recommend the following in order to increase the efficiency of the Dental Corps of the Army and secure a more equitable recognition of the dental profession in matters of health and the military status of the Dental Corps:

1. A dental reserve corps, similar to the Medical Reserve Corps, to replace the present "acting dental surgeons," except that members of the dental reserve corps shall be obligated to serve when called upon for active duty.

2. The Dental Corps to consist of—

(a) First lieutenants, to be appointed from the dental reserve corps after two years' active service, who shall be not less than 23 nor more than 30 years of age, and otherwise qualified as at present.

(b) Captains, who shall be promoted to this grade after seven years of total service, including service in dental reserve corps and as contract dental surgeon, dental surgeon, or acting dental surgeon.

(c) Majors, not to exceed 25 per cent of the Dental Corps, to be promoted according to seniority, as in the Medical Corps.

(d) A colonel, who shall be Chief of the Dental Corps, acting under the direction of the Surgeon General, to be appointed by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, for a period of four years. The first colonel to be appointed from the 15 senior officers of the Dental Corps, after which they shall be appointed from the majors of this corps.

3. The strength of the Dental Corps to be as now provided (1 to 1,000 of the enlisted strength).

4. The service heretofore rendered as dental surgeon, contract dental surgeon, or acting dental surgeon shall be computed as commissioned service.

5. The right to command shall be limited to the members of the Dental Corps and the dental reserve corps and to enlisted men serving as their assistants.

Respectfully submitted.

LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE NATIONAL DENTAL ASSOCIATION.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Bock, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom if the press, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Milaca, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of the City Council of Sioux City, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to superannuated employees of the Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Stockbridge, Mass., remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Calmar, Iowa, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate commerce in the products of convict-made goods, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COLT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rhode Island, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. 3539) for the relief of John L. Moon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 251) thereon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, from the Committee on Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 4401) to conduct investigations and experiments for ameliorating the damage wrought to the fisheries by predacious fishes and aquatic animals, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 252) thereon.

PORTRAIT OF JOHN LANGDON.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 118, submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I call the attention of the senior Senator from New Hampshire to the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution. The amendment of the committee was, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$1,500" and to insert "$1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library is hereby authorized to have made an oil portrait of John Langdon, the first President pro tempore of the Senate, to be hung in the main corridor of the Senate, the cost not to exceed the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, while I should be glad to have had the sum named in the original resolution appropriated, yet I think a portrait can be obtained for the amount proposed in the amendment, and so I make no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 4995) granting a pension to Mary Laroche; and

A bill (S. 5023) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy W. Sheffield (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5024) for the relief of the Yakima Savings & Loan Association, of North Yakima, Wash.;

A bill (S. 5025) for the relief of the German Savings, Building & Loan Association, of Seattle, Wash.; and

A bill (S. 5026) for the relief of the Pacific Building & Loan Association; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 5027) granting an increase of pension to Nicholas B. Langley; and

A bill (S. 5028) granting a pension to Emaline King; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 5029) granting an increase of pension to Elias Pleukharp; and

A bill (S. 5030) granting a pension to Bertha C. Pratt; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BORAH. In introduce a joint resolution for my colleague [Mr. BRADY], who is absent on account of illness, and I ask that it be received and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 113) for the relief of Fred White was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment proposing to repeal that part of section 2, chapter 38, page 533, Thirty-seventh United States Statutes at Large, relative to the publishing of a sworn statement in the second issue of such newspaper, magazine, or other publications printed next after the filing of such statement, intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to repeal that part of section 2, chapter 38, page 533, Thirty-seventh United States Statutes at Large, relative to the duty of the editor, publisher, business manager, or owner of every newspaper, magazine, periodical, or other publication to file with the Postmaster General and with the postmaster at which such publication is entered not later than the 1st day of April and the 1st day of October of each year a sworn statement, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment relative to the allotment to individual Red Lake Indians of certain lands within the Red Lake Indian Forest, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 10385), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AN AMERICAN ARMY SCHOOL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a copy of an article written by Mr. Keller, State senator of Illinois, which appeared in Harper's Weekly, November 20, 1915, in which he discusses and makes certain suggestions about educational advantages which might be extended to private soldiers. This is a very important question, and we are now considering it in the Senate. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

AN AMERICAN ARMY SCHOOL.

We may as well face the fact that when this European slaughter is over and its horrors removed from our very eyes America is going to prosper greatly, rejoice, and talk peace, and straightway forget the necessity of being prepared to defend our rights and liberties when troubled days shall come again.

Getting through this present crisis without a fight will only make our self-satisfaction and sense of security the greater.

It can only be hoped that now, while the necessity for a defensive army is clear to the very great majority of Americans, we may develop some rational system for providing and maintaining one.

It must not be an army founded on present emergencies, but one that will justify its existence and continuance even throughout the long years of peace to come.

If we are to have an army, it must be an American army in every sense of the word. It must be the most efficient army in the world. Its organization and maintenance must be in harmony with our best traditions and highest ideals of liberty and equality. It must appeal to the common sense of the people generally as not only an efficient weapon of defense but as well an army beneficial to the country in time of peace; an army around which the Nation can grow without any of the fears which our ancestors had about large standing armies.

Even under universal peace pacts and peace treaties we must still maintain the spirit as well as the ability to defend against aggression. To lose either might endanger our liberty and our civilization.

How to prepare against such a contingency most effectively and at the least cost in money and the least loss of industrial energy is the question. Any army we may form must be and remain a volunteer army. No form of conscription will be found necessary nor would be tolerated.

We must not adopt bodily some system from some other country that may appear excellent for that country but that has not been tried out in actual warfare. We ought, rather, to originate some plan of our own, suited to our own conditions, the fundamental principles of which have been thoroughly well proven in actual conflict of arms.

An army is a development. To be a soldier is to have made a growth. Soldiering to-day is a business which requires thorough preparation. It is not founded on patriotism and enthusiasm alone. The technique of soldiering reaches to almost every branch of science to-day, and in the future this tendency will be greatly extended. The soldier who does not know his duties and know well how to perform them in conjunction with his comrades may, in case of conflict, be in the way rather than helpful against a well-trained enemy. It is easy enough to get shot for one's country.

Military drill a few minutes each week in schools, a few weeks' outing in summer camps, a business men's army league to drill when they can spare a little time, a three weeks' militia encampment with occasional evenings at drill between times, a summer school for officers that can neither make actual officers of them nor soldiers of the boys back home, and all the other kindred attempts at soldiering are good and inspiring in many ways. But a little study of the European conflict will show any thoughtful man what a grim and terrible thing warfare is and that it is impossible to prepare for it too well. We must face the matter with open eyes at least. It is no less than the truth to say that to send these fine, courageous militia boys, these enthusiastically patriotic summer soldiers, against three-year men would be little better than murder. Three-year men only can meet three-year men on equal terms.

Germany required the men who are making these astounding drives to serve working two years constantly in the infantry and three years in the cavalry and artillery. France tried out a shorter time of service for her soldiers to her heart's content. She was compelled to admit the inferiority of these short-service men, and adopted the same period of service as the Germans. A shorter period of service will not make soldiers of Americans. We must see this plainly or suffer dearly for our folly if the test ever comes.

The necessity for this long preparation is fully understood and appreciated by all military men. It must also be fully accepted by the people of this country generally before we can have a real Army. The hope that any makeshifts will do ought not to be indulged in at all in any quarter. To rely on summer soldiers is to court disaster. It is training that makes the soldier—it is training that makes the officer—plenty of training and plenty of time. It takes trained soldiers and trained officers both to make an army.

West Point takes plain American boys, with only fair education, without any proof of soldierly qualities, aptitude for war, or native ability to command, and in four years' constant training and educating hammers them not only into soldiers of the first class, but into officers—commanders and leaders of soldiers—the equal of any military men in the world.

THE AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY.

The plan here offered to meet the requirements makes no pretension to completeness. It is set out rather as a basis for discussion in the hope that rational direction may be given the present general desire for some adequate means of national defense.

THE PLAN.

1. Let 100,000 boys, between the ages of 15 and 18, apportioned among the States, volunteer each year into the American school army for a period of three years.

2. Let these volunteers devote from two to three hours (about the time used in West Point) daily to military drill, army exercises, study of military science, and physical training and education, including sanitation, prevention of disease, and like broad general information.

3. The remaining time to be devoted to study along general educational lines, devoting especial attention to agriculture, manual training and the arts, trades, and sciences that are best adapted to fitting men for practical work of life.

4. These boys are to live constantly under the strictest military discipline, and to maintain a standard of morals equal to the best secular military schools.

5. The United States should pay all costs of maintenance, food, clothing, instruction, medical attendance, and a small allowance for "spending money." The boys themselves would do all the labor of every kind and character, the same as soldiers do under conditions of war. This would not only train them in actual soldiering, but the expense of maintenance will be so low that the number suggested in this plan will prove no burden to the country.

6. The boys in return for this three years of schooling and methodical growth are, upon graduation, to become reservists for a period of 20 years, subject to call to the colors, classified so as to let the oldest be called last in case of war.

7. These schools should be distributed in large units, probably not less than 10,000 in a unit, in localities best suited to their work. The school should continue for the ordinary school year. Then for 10 weeks the boys should break camp and march under the usual conditions of war to central points where large armies should meet for maneuver. This would give the officers every opportunity to learn the handling, moving, and supplying of large bodies of soldiers. It would give the men every experience in actual soldiering under all the conditions of war. It was such great maneuvers that perfected both the European men and officers for these immense strategic moves.

8. In this school army leadership would be encouraged among the boys from the very beginning. The natural leaders would come to the front. Officers for this school army would be selected from among its own ranks, and all who aspired to leadership would be graded and classified for future reference. From among those who had shown the best leadership and fitness for command and for special technical service would be selected, at graduation, as many as should be required for higher officers. These ablest men—these strongest natural leaders—would be sent for four years to a greater West Point, or West Points, where they would very certainly develop into the world's best military men.

9. The Government would establish an Army and Navy journal for the use of all Army and Navy men After graduation all the men would receive this journal free during the entire 20 years, wherever they should go.

This journal would keep every reservist constantly in touch with military and naval development all over the world. Their training and experience would enable them to at once understand and use intelligently every new invention or method of warfare in case war should be thrust upon us. It would make American reservists the most intelligent in the world. It would stimulate inventive genius among a vast number of trained, resourceful men. It would keep up interest, encourage individual growth, and aid team intelligence.

10. This system would result in giving the United States 2,000,000 men constantly ready, the best trained, the most intelligent, and resourceful soldiers in the world—not machines, but men who would grow as military invention and practice grows. It would put us in position to say to all nations, "We will do no wrong; we will suffer no wrong."

From this school-army idea would naturally develop an American school-navy system, either as an independent or coordinate establishment, as should be found most practicable.

THE LESSER THINGS THAT MAY BE THE GREATER.

Aside from military purposes, this school-army system would give the country each year 100,000 graduates in usefulness.

It would offer to every boy who had for any reason been denied an education an opportunity for three years of the best schooling possible. It would set a physical standard for all American men outside the school army as well as in it. This would lead ultimately to an American ideal of physical manhood, so much needed and so much neglected.

Every locality would get back some boy grown to inspiring manhood, drilled in industry, schooled in patriotism, able to think, clean, knowing sanitation for himself and for his community; the making of a broad-gauged American, whom his country had educated and who would owe his best service to his country—fit to father the coming race of better men.

The thorough mixing in the school army of these boys from all the various States and sections of the country would nationalize the school, and through it the Nation. The hyphen would disappear from our citizenship as naturally as ripened leaves fall to give place to a newer growth.

This school-army system would stimulate and make permanent the heroic in American men.

It would let us hark back easily to the simple Sparta life. It would recognize the real, the necessary. It would make efficiency the natural thing.

These reservists would know the reason for obedience to law, which our young men to-day do not know and which our schools do not teach.

The total lack of system in the thought of our youth, the resulting chaos of mind and act, would of necessity give way to the methodical competition of these efficient reservists.

It would make organization of industry in the broadest sense a part of our natural development, a thing now quite impossible.

The young man who spends three years in this school army will be further along industrially three years after his graduation than if he had spent the whole six years in industry without the training. For all the years to follow he would do proportionately as well, whether working for some one else or for himself. This training would always open many doors of opportunity to him because of his largely increased intelligence, which without it would have remained closed.

COMPARISONS AND COMMENTS.

None of the plans to form an army of adult citizens is feasible, simply because no sufficiently large body of full-grown Americans will ever consent to the conditions of army life for the length of time necessary to form an efficient army, except in the immediate presence of a condition of war.

We have had a standing Army for 50 years, and have not one reservist. When the last man's enlistment is out the Army ceases to exist.

A regular army large enough to be important probably can not be had, even if we cover all the remaining billboards with flaring advertisements. And we ought not to want one, because a body of adult citizens to be trained into an army is too entirely wasteful to be considered seriously. This applies with even greater force to our militia. They can not afford to leave their business long enough to become soldiers, any more than the business can afford to have them leave it. They, like all other adults, are where they are doing the most good, or growing toward that position.

There would be no waste in the school army. It would utilize the empty place between the time a boy should finish the public school and the time at which he is developed sufficiently for industrial service, to the great mutual benefit of the boy and the Nation.

This saving of the wages of the adults and the enormous gains in efficiency of the school-army reservists are most important considerations.

It is easy for boys to adapt themselves to the discipline of military life; it is difficult for men to do so.

There would be no lack of volunteers for this school army. With strict moral discipline maintained, most parents would want their boys to have the training, and most boys would certainly want the experience and growth. But if for any reason there should be a lack of volunteers, the Government has within its discretion the power to easily and certainly induce many more to volunteer than the number suggested.

There would always be an abundance of reservists at graduation, willing to serve for a reasonable time in manning and caring for the coast defenses and such duties as are now especially required of the Regular Army.

Last, but not least, these reservists who had studied and drilled and soldiered for three years and marched and maneuvered in great armies would not only furnish their own officers, but would abundantly supply the very best of officers, for all the lower grades, at least, for as many volunteer soldiers as the country could produce in case of such dire necessity.

OSAGE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I desire to offer.

The resolution (S. Res. 125) was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior in his report to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs in relation to the Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, pertaining to the oil lands of the Osage Indians, used the following language: "The apparent purpose of this resolution is that the Barnsdall Oil Co. may secure valuable property belonging to the Osage Tribe in excess of the acreage permitted under the tribal resolution and the regulations of this department without competition and without compensation"; and

Whereas Senate resolution No. 107, which supersedes Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, would turn over to the Barnsdall Oil Co. and others a much larger amount of Osage oil properties on less favorable terms for the Indians than Senate concurrent resolution No. 4: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs be directed to investigate and report to the Senate the estimated value of the Osage oil properties, if any, which would be turned over under said resolution to the Barnsdall Oil Co., to the Gypsy Oil Co., and to Foster & Brennan without competition and without compensation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule for one day.

Mr. GORE. I send to the desk another resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Oklahoma submits another resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The resolution (S. Res. 126) was read, as follows:

Whereas in the hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs on Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, in relation to Osage oil lands, the report as to the investments, gross and net earnings, and dividends of the Barnsdall Oil Co. did not come down to a later date than January 1, 1915; and

Whereas much of the time since Juanary 1, 1915, has been a prosperous and profitable period in the oil industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs be directed to investigate and report to the Senate as to the gross and net earnings, profits, and dividends of the Barnsdall Oil Co., the Gypsy Oil Co., and Foster & Brennan since January 1, 1915; and also to ascertain and report as to the total amount of oil produced by the Barnsdall Oil Co. and to what company or companies said production was sold; also to investigate and report as to the activities of Earl Oliver and the interests he represents and as to the activities of representatives of other interests in relation to all pending proposals to lease, re-lease, or sell oil properties of the Osage Tribe of Indians.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over for a day under the rule.

ARMY AVIATION SERVICE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a joint resolution was passed on Thursday last by the Senate for an investigation of the Army Aviation Corps. It was incorrectly enrolled, and I should like to have a resolution passed recalling that joint resolution from the House so that it may be corrected.

The resolution (S. Res. 127) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the resolution (S. J. Res. 65) entitled "Joint resolution creating a joint commission of Congress to be known as the Joint Commission of Congress to Investigate the Aviation Service of the United States Army."

CONFIRMATION OF CHARLES F. CURLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. OWEN obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has called my attention to the situation that on account of the resignation and absence of the district attorney of Delaware the holding of court there, which begins the first of next week, will be very greatly embarrassed because of the lack of a representative of the Government of the United States. The Senator from Delaware thinks—and I concur in his view—that it is very important in the public interest that action should be immediately taken by the Senate on the confirmation of the appointment of district attorney in that State. I am assured that there will be no objection to the confirmation; and in that view, if the Senator from Oklahoma would permit, I would be glad if the Senate would have a very short executive session.

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma having yielded the floor, the Senator from Missouri is now recognized to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, are there not precedents, I will ask the Senator, where confirmations have been made in open session in emergency cases such as this?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I dislike to see the galleries cleared for a few moments' executive session.

Mr. STONE. So do I. I concur in that expression.
